Mediators facilitate dialogue and communication among parties in conflict to move them toward a resolution of their own making. But communication is a two-way street, and what we intend to communicate is not always what is received and processed by the listener. In order to interpret, integrate, and understand information, adults engage in a process of sense-making.

In this discussion, Theodore K. Cheng, Adjunct Professor, New York Law School, and Diane Rosen, Counsel, Herrick Feinstein LLP, will examine how mediation participants ingest, digest, and make meaning of information. The two experts will explore how adults learn and process communications to help create opportunity and potential for parties to consider possibilities and alternatives for resolving their differences.
