9-18-1986

Federal Courts, Federal Crimes and Federalism

Roger J. Miner ‘56

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.nyls.edu/federalism

Part of the Constitutional Law Commons

Recommended Citation

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Speeches and Writings at DigitalCommons@NYLS. It has been accepted for inclusion in Federalism by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@NYLS.
FEDERAL COURTS, FEDERAL CRIMES, AND FEDERALISM

Roger J. Miner
The forthcoming celebration of the bicentennial of the framing of the United States Constitution provides us all with a special opportunity to re-examine our national charter and the unique federal system it established. An important debate concerning the need to refer to the intent of the Framers in interpreting the Constitution already is under way.¹ That there should be a debate over this issue seems curious to me, because judges and lawyers always begin their analysis of any document with an inquiry into the intention of the parties. It would seem especially important that they do so with a document as significant as the Constitution.

In this Article, I open the discussion on a different front, hoping perhaps to trigger another debate. I begin with the proposition that the enlarged criminal jurisdiction of the federal courts has led to an increasing federalization of the criminal law. Whether that proposition invokes a challenge to the system of dual sovereignty established by the Framers of our Constitution is the question I propose for debate. The discussion should be of particular interest to those concerned with maintaining the traditional functions of the states and the vitality of the Tenth Amendment.² Historically, of course, the detection, apprehension, prosecution, and punishment of those accused of anti-social conduct have been considered state functions of the most basic kind.

As I see it, the growing use of the federal courts for criminal prosecutions is attributable to three factors: ongoing congressional interest in the development of new criminal legislation, expansive interpretation of federal criminal statutes by the courts, and demands by state and local governments for federal assistance in criminal law enforcement. Add to these factors the vigor of some federal prosecutors in filling the gaps perceived to exist in state prosecutions, and we have the makings of a glut that threatens to overwhelm the federal courts—courts that were designed to handle a limited number of crimes affecting national interests.

¹ See, e.g., Brennan, Stevens & Meese, Address—Construing the Constitution, 19 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 2 (1985).
² The Tenth Amendment provides: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." U.S. Const. amend. X.

The restricted role intended for the federal government in regard to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction is apparent from a reading of the Constitution itself. Jurisdiction over criminal matters is referred to specifically in the Constitution in only four of the enumerated powers of Congress: the power to provide punishment for the counterfeiting of United States securities and coin, the power to "punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas and Offences against the Law of Nations," the power to exercise authority at the seat of federal government and in federal enclaves, and the power to punish treason. Obviously, the Framers expected that general criminal jurisdiction would remain with the States. James Madison put it this way in Number 45 of the Federalist papers:

The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the federal government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State.

Despite the limitations envisioned by Madison, the Constitution delegates to Congress a number of broad-ranging enumerated powers dealing with various matters of domestic concern. The Constitution also confers upon Congress the power to enact laws necessary and proper for the execution of those enumerated powers and for the execution of all other powers vested in the officers, departments and government of the United States. The authority to adopt criminal legislation is derived from these provisions in our national charter. For example, the first criminal statute, enacted by the first Congress in 1789, defined certain customs offenses and was based on the enumerated power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. The Crimes Act of 1790, the earliest federal criminal code, established penalties for four categories of prohibited activities within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government: felonies committed on the high seas, offenses directly affecting the operations of government, crimes committed within federal enclaves, and interference with the functioning of the federal courts. The offenses sanctioned in the Crimes Act either were mentioned specifically in the Constitution or established under the authority of the Necessary and Proper Clause.

5. U.S. Const. art. 1, § 8, cl. 17.
6. U.S. Const. art. 3, § 3.

The Judiciary Act of 1789 divided jurisdiction for the trial of crimes against the United States between the district courts and the circuit courts. As originally constituted, the circuit courts consisted of one district judge and two Supreme Court justices and had both trial and appellate jurisdiction. The Act conferred upon the United States district courts jurisdiction over all crimes and offenses "cognizable under the authority of the United States, committed within their respective districts, or upon the high seas; where no other punishment than whipping, not exceeding thirty stripes, a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months, is to be inflicted . . . ." Jurisdiction over crimes calling for greater punishments was vested in the circuit courts.

The very limited jurisdiction of the district courts was the cause of some inefficiency in the early criminal justice system. The minutes of the Supreme Court dated February 8, 1791 include a copy of a letter from James Duane, first judge of the

11. Ch. 9, § 1, 1 Stat. 112, 112.
12. Ch. 20, 1 Stat. 73.
13. Ch. 20, § 9, 1 Stat. at 75.
15. See, e.g., ch. 20, §§ 4, 5 & 11, 1 Stat. at 74, 75 & 78.
17. Ch. 20, § 11, 1 Stat. at 78.
District of New York, to Chief Justice John Jay. Judge Duane advised that he had committed to custody one Goreham, Master of the Sloop Hiram, for "Breach of Revenue Laws aggravated by Perjury" and one Seely, mate aboard the same vessel, for landing a cargo of coffee at night without reporting. Noting that he was without jurisdiction to try these offenses by reason of the extent of punishment involved, Judge Duane requested that a circuit court be convened in New York, and it was so ordered by the Supreme Court. 18

It was not until 1891 that the circuit courts became circuit courts of appeals, exercising appellate jurisdiction only. 19 Now, of course, the district courts have original jurisdiction of all offenses against the laws of the United States. 20 Some lawyers describe the present-day courts of appeals as courts for the correction of district courts' errors, and for the perpetuation of their own. District judges compare circuit judges to soldiers who come onto the battlefield after the battle is over and shoot the wounded. One of my district judge friends swears that he once read a court of appeals opinion containing these words: "We reverse, substantially for the reasons stated in the decision of the court below."

A significant expansion of the criminal jurisdiction of the federal courts to cover crimes traditionally punished under state law came about in the Reconstruction Period following the Civil War. Until that time, federal criminal law generally was restricted to conduct directly affecting the functions and operations of the national government. The original mail fraud statute, enacted in 1872 as part of a legislative package dealing with the post office, 21 was remarkable as an extension of federal authority into an area formerly thought to be of state concern only. To be sure, the statute was enacted in furtherance of the constitutional power of Congress to establish post offices and post roads, 22 and, despite several amendments over the years, proof of its violation still requires a showing of use of the mails to establish jurisdiction. 23 This jurisdictional requirement has become attenuated, however, by virtue of the Supreme Court decision holding that the requirement is fulfilled if the use of the mails can be reasonably foreseen in connection with the scheme to defraud. 24

Court decisions defining the scope of the fraudulent conduct proscribed also have extended the reach of mail fraud prosecutions. Originally designed to prevent the misuse of the postal system, the mail fraud statute has evolved by judicial interpretation into a vehicle for the prosecution of an almost unlimited number of offenses bearing very little connection to the mails, which would ordinarily be prosecuted in the state courts. Cases involving official corruption at the state and local levels have been introduced into the federal courts under the umbrella of mail fraud, with the courts finding actionable fraud where the corrupt officials can be said to have deprived the citizenry of intangible rights to their honest, loyal, and faithful services. Ironically, this theory of breach of fiduciary duty found expression in a case in which the court said "[w]e are cognizant of the problem of the ever expanding use of the mail fraud statute to reach activities that heretofore were considered within the exclusive domain of State regulation." 25

In recent years the courts have sustained mail fraud convictions or indictments of a local political leader whose special relationship with the local government was considered sufficient to impose a public duty upon him, 26 of an employee said to have breached a duty to disclose material information to his employer, 27 of a corporate officer for diversion of corporate funds to unknown purposes, 28 and of an attorney for a fraud generated by a conflict of interest. 29

A similarly broad range of activity is encompassed by the wire fraud statute, 30 the twin of the mail fraud provision. Under that statute, the conviction of a man who established a bogus talent agency for the purpose of meeting and seducing young women was affirmed.\textsuperscript{31}

Chief Justice Burger has written that "[w]hen a 'new' fraud develops—as constantly happens—the mail fraud statute becomes a stopgap device to deal on a temporary basis with the new phenomenon, until particularized [federal] legislation can be developed and passed to deal directly with the evil."\textsuperscript{32} To my mind, that statement raises these important issues: whether there is a need for a proliferation of criminal statutes to deal with matters already covered under the mail fraud heading; whether the expanded interpretation of mail fraud implicates the Sixth Amendment right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; and, most important, whether there is a place for state criminal law in the formulation of responses to new varieties of fraud.

As a fount of federal criminal jurisdiction, the power of Congress to establish the post office pales into insignificance in comparison with its power to regulate commerce among the several states.\textsuperscript{33} At the turn of this century, Congress found the need to respond to problems the States could not resolve and began to enact criminal legislation to fulfill that need under the guise of protecting the channels of interstate commerce. The Lottery Act,\textsuperscript{34} prohibiting the transportation of lottery tickets in interstate commerce, and the Mann Act,\textsuperscript{35} prohibiting the movement of women across state lines for prostitution, were early examples of such laws. In upholding the constitutionality of these two Acts, the Supreme Court rejected Tenth Amendment violation arguments,\textsuperscript{36} as well as contentions that the commerce power was not broad enough to support the legislation.\textsuperscript{37} Thus reinforced by the Supreme Court, Congress pushed on to adopt new criminal statutes purportedly protective of interstate commerce channels, supposedly responsive to problems unreachable by state law, and always intrusive into areas previously of exclusive state concern: transportation of \textsuperscript{31} United States v. Condolon, 600 F.2d 7 (4th Cir. 1979).

\textsuperscript{33} U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.
\textsuperscript{34} Ch. 191, 28 Stat. 963 (1895) (current version codified at 18 U.S.C. §§ 1301-07 (1982)).
\textsuperscript{36} Champion v. Ames, 188 U.S. 321 (1903).
\textsuperscript{37} Hoke v. United States, 227 U.S. 306 (1912).
stolen vehicles,\textsuperscript{38} kidnapping,\textsuperscript{39} flight to avoid prosecution,\textsuperscript{40} and theft from interstate commerce.\textsuperscript{41}

When the Supreme Court upheld the authority of Congress under the Commerce Clause to regulate intrastate activity affecting interstate commerce,\textsuperscript{42} the stage was set for the most expansive intervention of the federal government in crime control since the beginning of the Republic. This extremely broad interpretation of the commerce power has enabled Congress to provide for the prosecution of local racketeering under the Hobbs Act,\textsuperscript{43} which punishes those who affect commerce by robbery or extortion; the Travel Act,\textsuperscript{44} which prohibits interstate travel in conjunction with various forms of unlawful activity; the Extortionate Credit Transaction Act,\textsuperscript{45} which outlaws extortionate credit transactions or "loansharking;" and, in recent years, the all-purpose Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.\textsuperscript{46}

Whether the Constitution permitted the enactment of the federal loan shark statute was the issue before the Supreme Court in \textit{Perez v. United States}.\textsuperscript{47} In my opinion, the Court's affirmative answer to that question marked an astounding change in the concept of federal criminal jurisdiction. The Court there held that a local loan shark could be convicted without \textit{any} showing of a nexus between his activities and interstate commerce. The basis for jurisdiction was found in a \textit{congressional determination} that interstate commerce was affected by a tie-in between the class of all extortionate credit transactions and organized crime.\textsuperscript{48} Justice Stewart's dissent in \textit{Perez}, however, seems compelling. He wrote:

\begin{quote}
It is not enough to say that loan sharking is a national problem, for all crime is a national problem. It is not enough to \end{quote}

\begin{footnotes}
\textsuperscript{38} 18 U.S.C. § 2312 (1982).
\textsuperscript{39} 18 U.S.C. §§ 1201-02 (1982).
\textsuperscript{40} 18 U.S.C. §§ 1073-74 (1982).
\textsuperscript{42} Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 118-29 (1942).
\textsuperscript{47} 402 U.S. 146 (1971).
\textsuperscript{48} See id. at 155.
\end{footnotes}
say that some loan sharking has interstate characteristics, for any crime may have an interstate setting. And the circumstance that loan sharking has an adverse impact on interstate business is not a distinguishing attribute, for interstate business suffers from almost all criminal activity, be it shoplifting or violence in the streets.\footnote{Id. at 157-58 (Stewart, J., dissenting).}

Thus it is that local trafficking in controlled substances, as well as local fraud, loan sharking, theft, racketeering, municipal corruption, and many other crimes involving matters primarily of local concern have become grist for the federal prosecutor’s mill. As I see it, the ongoing federalization of the criminal law has brought with it some very significant constitutional and pragmatic problems. The problems are these:

(1) Unrealistic expectations. In 1985, a total of 39,500 criminal cases were filed in the ninety-four United States district courts.\footnote{ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS, THE UNITED STATES COURTS: A PICTORIAL SUMMARY 3 (1985).} During the same period, more than 1,000 criminal cases were filed in the superior courts of the New York state court system alone.\footnote{New York State Unified Court System: Superior Court—Criminal Terms, Executive Summary 3 (Jan. 30, 1986) (computer printout).} The Criminal Court of the City of New York is said to handle 280,000 misdemeanor cases each year.\footnote{Fox, Shift of Civil Court Judges Proposed for “Crack” Backlog, N.Y. L.J., Aug. 14, 1986, at 1, col. 3.} Last year, there were 55,000 narcotics arrests in New York City,\footnote{Fox, Shift of Civil Court Judges Proposed for “Crack” Backlog, N.Y. L.J., Aug. 14, 1986, at 1, col. 3.}
City.\textsuperscript{56} Nationwide, for the same period, there were but 5,623 marijuana, controlled substance, and narcotics cases filed for consideration by 575 United States district judges.\textsuperscript{57} Between 1984 and 1985, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York sustained an increase in its total criminal caseload of 51.5%, from 695 to 1,053 cases.\textsuperscript{58} Is it realistic to expect that the federal courts in New York City can shoulder ten percent of the City's drug cases, as suggested by the state's Chief Administrative Judge?\textsuperscript{59} Does it make sense to designate state prosecutors as federal prosecutors for this purpose, as proposed?\textsuperscript{60} From whence are to come the necessary court facilities and personnel? It simply is unrealistic to expect that the federal courts ever will be able to make the slightest inroads in handling the cases arising out of the tens of thousands of narcotics and other crimes committed in the nation in each year.

(2) \textit{Diversion of scarce federal resources.} This problem was delineated in a decision of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in a narcotics distribution case heard last year.\textsuperscript{61} As a member of the panel issuing that decision, I was privileged to concur in the opinion of a colleague, Jon O. Newman, who wrote as follows:

Though the case was developed by New York City police officers, concerns readily visible criminal conduct requiring no special investigatory resources or equipment, and involves a $30 transaction, the matter became the subject of a federal criminal prosecution because it occurred on "federal day," the day of the week when federal law enforcement authorities have decided to convert garden-variety state law drug offenses into federal offenses. Though we are urged in other contexts to tolerate missed deadlines because of the enormous burdens placed upon limited numbers of federal law enforcement personnel, . . . on "federal day" there are apparently enough federal prosecutors available with sufficient time to devote to $30 drug cases that have been developed solely by state law enforcement officers. Be that as it may,

\begin{thebibliography}{10}
\bibitem{59} Fox, supra note 55, at 2, col. 5.
\bibitem{61} United States v. Agilar, 779 F.2d 123 (2d Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 1385 (1986).
\end{thebibliography}
the case is lawfully within the jurisdiction of the federal courts and must be decided. 62

The obvious question presented by the decision is this: Should the federal courts be used for the prosecution of $30 “buy and bust” cases? I suggest that it might be a better use of resources to reserve federal courts for the prosecution of major interstate and international trafficking in those pernicious substances that have become a modern-day plague in our nation. The same considerations should apply to other crimes as well—federal prosecution should be limited to misconduct affecting clearly defined national interests.

3 Duplication of effort in law enforcement. It seems inevitable that problems will arise when state and local prosecutors have the authority to prosecute the same acts as violations of both state and federal law. Sometimes, there are unseemly “turf” wars, as was seen recently in New York City in connection with investigations into allegations of municipal corruption. 63 Sometimes, of course, there are clashes over who should be prosecuting crimes in mutual jurisdiction situations, as demonstrated in regard to drug prosecutions in New York City. 64 Always, there is the spectre of duplication, waste, and destructive competition for the taxpayer’s law enforcement dollar. Although there is no constitutional bar to punishing a person twice for one act offensive to both federal and state sovereigns, is it necessary? Is it efficient? I suggest that the public interest is not well served by duplication of effort in law enforcement.

4 Unbridled discretion of federal prosecutors. As Congress defines ever more crimes, it becomes inevitable that federal prosecutors gain ever more discretion to decide what crimes they will prosecute. This is so because the expansion of federal law enforcement agencies, prosecutors and courts cannot keep pace with the proliferation of federal crimes. Federal district attorneys, therefore, must become very selective as to the crimes they will prosecute and those they will decline to prosecute. These appointed officials thus acquire the greatest power in the law enforcement field, because to them is entrusted the

62. Id. at 125 (citation omitted).
64. N.Y. Times, July 14, 1986, at B1, col. 5.
authority to decide which cases they will bring to court and which they will not.

An attorney recently told me of the great effort he was making to persuade a United States Attorney not to prosecute his client for a state sales tax violation. (The prosecution was threatened under the mail fraud statute, of course.) My impression was that the case would be won or lost on the question of the exercise of discretion. Where there are many criminal violations but only a few can be chosen for prosecution, the prosecutor invades the province of the lawmaker. The inevitable result is a public perception that the process is unfair.

(5) Loss of the capacity for self-government. The citizenry increasingly has been conditioned to turn to federal law enforcement and to the federal courts as the first line of defense against anti-social conduct. What we are witnessing is an abdication of responsibility for self-government, reflected in the attitudes and lack of accountability of those chosen to govern at the state and local level. In the face of municipal corruption, it is easy to send for the "federals." If narcotics are sold on the street corners of a major city, it is a simple matter to invoke high-profile federal criminal prosecution. When loan sharks and racketeers infest a municipality, local law enforcement efforts can be relaxed if federal help is on the way.

But something is lost in the process—the traditions of democratic self-government and of individual involvement and neighborly concern that have been the hallmarks of our society. To invite federal authorities to define and prosecute crime involving activities primarily of state and local interest is to concede that state and local government cannot be moved to serve the will of the people. I do not believe that the American people are prepared to make that concession.

Before there is a complete merger of state and federal law, the following steps might be considered:

(1) Congress should undertake a study of each and every federal criminal statute, identifying those dealing with matters of true national interest and discarding all others.

(2) No new federal criminal legislation should be enacted without assessing the impact of the legislation on federal courts and other federal resources.

(3) Consideration should be given to conferring upon state courts jurisdiction over certain federal crimes. This is not a new concept; it has roots in the early days of our judicial system.65

(4) The Department of Justice should develop, enforce, and widely disseminate precise guidelines circumscribing the exercise of discretion by United States Attorneys.66 These guidelines should proscribe duplication of state prosecution.

(5) Mail fraud and other criminal statutes given expansive interpretation by the courts because of imprecise statutory language should be studied with a view toward adopting more specific descriptions of the conduct prohibited.67

(6) The excellent program introduced by the Department of Justice to promote cooperation and coordination among local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies should be expanded and encouraged.68

The criminal law is but one area in which Congress has intruded and displaced the functions of the States. But it is the duty of Congress, just as much as it is the duty of the judicial and executive branches, to maintain that deliberately measured allocation of authority between the States and the federal government provided by the Constitution. Given the "underdeveloped capacity [of Congress] for self-restraint,"69 to use a phrase coined by Justice O'Connor, there may be some doubt whether the legislative branch has any great enthusiasm for that duty. Chief Justice Marshall wrote that the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause is restrained by "[t]he wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections."70 These same factors are implicated in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction under the Commerce Clause and in the whole issue of the state-federal criminal law dichotomy. Of these factors, the most important is the influence of the electorate, because in this democratic society the proper direction of our federal system can be determined only by the people.

66. See generally Schwartz, Federal Criminal Jurisdiction and Prosecutors' Discretion, 13 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 64 (1948).

68. Under this program, the individual United States Attorneys have organized Law Enforcement Coordinating Committees to achieve the program's goals.

THE FEDERALIST SOCIETY PRESENTS:

JUDGE ROGER MINER
U.S. Second Circuit Court of Appeals speaking on FEDERAL COURTS, FEDERAL CRIMES
and FEDERALISM

Judge Miner, an entertaining speaker, has been mentioned as a candidate for the next Supreme Court opening.

Attendees will have an opportunity to ask questions, and meet officials of the Federalist Society. This event is open to the public; there is no attendance fee.

The Federalist Society is composed of judges, lawyers and law students (as well as lay members) who support the principles of limited government, and careful separation of governmental powers. Speakers at past Federalist Society events have included Chief Justice Burger, Justice Rehnquist, Professor Emeritus Raoul Berger of the Harvard Law School, Professor Richard Epstein of the University of Chicago Law School, and others. Information concerning the Society can be obtained by calling (202) 822-8138, or by writing to the New York Chapter at 80 Wall Street, Suite 1015, N.Y., N.Y. 10005.

Sept. 18th, 6:00 P.M.
PLACE: HYATT HOTEL, Alvin Room, Conference Level
(THE HYATT HOTEL IS NEXT TO GRAND CENTRAL STATION)
Miner Urges Curbing U.S. Role In Fighting Local Drug Crime

By Alan Kohn

A federal circuit judge, citing increasing use of federal laws to prosecute local crimes, has criticized use of U.S. prosecutors and judges to try persons involved in ordinary street purchases of narcotics.

Instead of federal prosecution of "$30 buy-and-bust cases," Judge Roger J. Miner suggested, it might be better to use federal resources for prosecution of major "Interstate and international trafficking in those pernicious substances that have become a modern-day plague in our nation."

National Interests Cited

For all crime, he asserted, federal prosecutions should be limited to "misconduct affecting clearly defined national interests."

Judge Miner, a member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, made his remarks at a speech last week before the New York City Chapter of the Federalist Society, an organization of judges, lawyers and law students who support limited government and separation of governmental powers.

The judge stated he was hoping to trigger a debate on the increasing federalization of criminal law, which he said was attributable to congressional development of new legislation, judges' "expansive interpretation" of laws and "demands of state and local government" for aid in criminal law enforcement.

Local Trafficking

Local trafficking in narcotics, as well as local fraud, loansharking, theft, racketeering, municipal corruption and "all other crimes involving matters primarily of local concern," Judge Miner said, "have become grist for the federal prosecutor's mill ... "The ongoing federalization of the criminal law has brought with it some very significant constitutional and pragmatic problems." Among the problems he cited was "unrealistic expectations."

The judge asked whether it was realistic to ask the federal courts in New York City to handle 10 percent of the City's drug cases, as one state judge has suggested, or to designate state prosecutors as federal attorneys to try narcotics cases.

He questioned where will the necessary court facilities and personnel come from. It "simply is unrealistic," he continued, "to expect that the federal courts ever will be able to make the slightest inroads in handling the cases arising out of the tens of thousands of narcotics and other crimes committed in the nation each year."

Such prosecutions, he asserted, resulted in a "diversion of scarce federal resources" and a "duplication of effort in law enforcement."

Other Problems Noted

Judge Miner also noted the problem of the "unbridled discretion of federal prosecutors" that arose from Congress's expansion of federal criminal jurisdiction.

Where there are many criminal violations but only a few can be chosen for prosecution, the judge said, the prosecutor "invades the province of the lawmaker. There is then a public perception that the process is unfair."

He also cited the problem of the "loss of capacity for self-government" by which the "citizenry increasingly has been conditioned to turn to federal law enforcement and to the federal courts as the first line of defense against anti-social conduct."

To invite federal authorities to define and prosecute crimes involving activities "primarily of state and local interest," the judge said, "is to concede that state and local government cannot be moved to serve the will of the people. I do not believe that the American people are prepared to make that concession."

6-Point Program

Before there is a "complete merger of state and federal law," Judge Miner suggested the following six steps might be considered:

- Congress should "study" every criminal law and eliminate all but those that deal with matters of "true national interest."
- No new federal criminal laws should be passed without assessing the impact of the legislation on federal courts and other federal resources.
- Congress should consider giving state courts jurisdiction over certain federal crimes, a suggestion that has its "roots in the early days of our judicial system."
- The Department of Justice should develop "precise guidelines circumscribing the exercise of discretion by U.S. Attorneys. These guidelines should prescribe duplication of state prosecution."
- Mail fraud and other criminal laws given "expansive interpretation" by judges because of "imprecise statutory language should be studied with a view toward adopting more specific descriptions of the conduct prohibited."
- The "excellent program" of the Department of Justice to promote cooperation and coordination among local, state and federal law-enforcement agencies should be expanded and encouraged.
Hitch's pick-up truck had soled damage to its front end and frame. It was facing north in the southbound lane.

The Pilafanos vehicle was smashed in its front passenger side and the rear seat was also doubled, facing south, with the hood in the northbound lane.

Anastasia Pilafanos was admitted to Northern Dutchess Hospital and was in fair condition this morning, the spokesman said.

A passenger, Katarina Pilafanos, was transferred to Kingston Hospital where she is in serious condition in the intensive care unit, the identifying officer reported.

Other passengers, another Katarina Pilafanos and Maria Pilafanos, were listed in fair condition at Northern Dutchess Hospital.

Police said the investigation is continuing.

* * *

WATSON -- The skies showed back from the Virgin Islands now that we had a full bloom going on.

The schedule of exact acts and times will be firm but not firmly set until Sun., in last minute changes and judgments.

Committee is made up of the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

The committee is made up of the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

On Friday, the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

On Friday, the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

On Friday, the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

On Friday, the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

On Friday, the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

On Friday, the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.

On Friday, the Dutch-Air of Middletown, a variety of judges and speakers - including Ed. Tully, the Richman Aviation assessor.
County towns show hike in self-insurance figures

By JANETTE LaCHAN
Hudson—Self-insurance appropriations for 1987 for Columbia County and its towns and villages are up $1,560 from 1986, according to figures released by the county treasurer's office.

The total for 1987 is $269,500, up from $271,560 in 1986.

The board of supervisors approved the 1987 self-insurance budget of $113,000 at its August meeting. Of that, $125,000 will be taken from reserves, with the total to be adjusted as needed, according to the resolution.

Under the self-insurance plan, appropriations are deducted from each municipality, county or city, but not actually billed in them. If a claim is beyond the cap of $413,500, the city of Hudson and the county with the 1984 rate for comparison. Listed first is the new rate, second in the 1986 cost.

—Austerlitz, $25,000; $288,500
—Canastota, $4,960; $7,712
—Chatham (town), $6,779; $2,377
—Columbia (village), $4,330; $4,904
—Claverack (town), $9,750; $6,089

Miner touted for next spot on High Court

Continued from page A-1

is the proposal I propose for debate," he said. "The discussion should be of particular interest to those concerned with maintaining the traditional functions of the states and the vitality of the 10th Amendment."

He said growing use of federal authorities for criminal prosecutions is attributable to Congressional interest in criminal legislation, especially the interpretation of federal criminal statutes by the courts and demands by state and local governments for federal help in criminal prosecution.

But said the federal role in criminal prosecutions is seen to be limited by the Constitution itself. He traced the history of a growing federal prosecution in criminal matters, as well as what he sees as its problems — including unrealistic expectations, diversion of resources, and duplication of local efforts, "subordinated discretion of federal prosecutors" and a loss of capacity for self-government.

He said criminal law is "one area where Congress has intruded into and displaced the functions of the states."

As a suggested solution to the study of each federal criminal statute, retaining all the state laws without assessing their impacts, giving state courts jurisdiction over federal crimes, development of guidelines for U.S. Attorney —making impartial legal assistance coordination of cooperation and coordination among local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies.

He concluded by saying the factor most important in the state-federal criminal law dilemma is the time that the electorate, because in this democratic society the proper distribution of our federal system can be determined only by the people.

Kirkhoffs, Secovnie blasted

Continued from page A-1

up in something she couldn't afford to defend herself on, nor did she have the health. Her health wouldn't sustain that ordeal, either. That doesn't give those people the right to persecute that woman. That doesn't fit with my view that are Democrats, as 'a Democrat for all Democrats, McGivney also contended that Watson was "sheer and pure bell," when the election, even to speak to the Republican commissioner instead of himself.

And, responding to Glenn Democrats' Chairman Ed Roos, who is also a member of the county Democrats' executive committee, McGivney said it is not up to the executive committee to review appointments by state election law, McGivney said, and he pointed out that the Assemblyman is a "special public defender, appointed by the Board of Elections." He added that Watson's appointment was "secret." McGivney said that "nothing I do in that office is a secret.

"I think Dick is confused on what we said. No one is persecuting her, or persecuting her," Secovnio said. "We already did that. All we said is that the full committee should be considered, since it was appointed by the full committee at the time and when nobody is in interested in positions of importance, all Democrats should be considered through the committee process and the best person should be considered, whether it may be."

"They work Pauline Kirkhoff did in August" was very important because a lot of people in 1984 we felt no longer lived in the district and the mail check is the only way to be sure they still do, he said.

"There's no grape should stop because it's very important that we have good working relationships with all members of the committee, and I am very seldom in contact with the board and doesn't want me to get lost, which is what he's talking about."

Our main objective should be to win this November for all our candidates and some of the best ways to do that is to allow input from all committees members on decisions that pertain to the electoral process," he said.

jury clears Watson in 12 minutes

Continued from page A-1

at the time of the incident, Watson said he believes the charges never should have been lodged against him.

The case against Watson centered on the testimony of Martin, who said he witnessed at least part of the alleged robbery and identified Watson as the robber.

But Connor was able to capitalize on contradictions in Mar-

The verdict ends "14 months of pure hell" for Watson, according to his sister Bernice Watson, who said she was elated by the decision.

Beauty Lee Watson, Julian's mother, said while she was happy, she also was tired.

"Julian has lost three jobs," she said, "but I lost a lot of sleep and my blood pressure has gone up."

Mrs. Watson said it was not a case of mistaken identity, but a "case of imagination on the part of officer Martin."

She said because of continuing court dates, she lost three jobs in the past 14 months. But she said she started a new job with Dinosaur Inc. in Hudson today.

After the jury verdict, Mrs. Watson heaped praise on Connor, who, she said is an "exceptional person."

"I want everyone in Columbia County, in the world, to know how great he really is even though he is 26 and young," she said. "He came to my home, day, night, on weekends and I wasn't able to pay him, but that didn't matter.

"I know he is going to succeed Connor, the son of state Supreme Court Judge John Conner, was special public defender for the case.

Mr. Watson could not say if she's considering civil action against the police, saying, "I really can't say what I'm going to do.

Assistant District Attorney William Lally said he was not disappointed with the outcome of the case, despite the fact that it was his first trial, (because the system worked). He said he had no idea what the deciding factor for the jury may have been.

The trial was to begin in late June but after articles on the case appeared in The Register Star, Judge Zittell declared a mistrial.

The first article detailed claims by Watson's first lawyer, George Dolan, that Watson and his mother had threatened him. A second article dealt with Con-nor's objections to the first article and the possibility of a mistrial.

Dolan, who was public defender at the time and is now Columbia County attorney, said he wanted to be removed from the case because he feared for his safety and for the safety of his staff.

These charges have been refused by Mr. Watson and by Ju-nique,因为我不同意，康

nor's objection to the first article and the possibility of a mistrial.

Because of the mistrial, Con-nor's attorney, Judge Zittell, asked for a mistrial and the possibility of a mistrial was considered.

The second trial was to begin in late June but after articles on the case appeared in The Register Star, Judge Zittell declared a mistrial.

In loving memory of my husband, Stanley (Sonny) Johnson, who passed away September 19, 1984. Loving memories never die, as years roll on and day's pass by. In my heart a memory is kept of one I loved and will never forget.
FEDERAL COURTS, FEDERAL CRIMES AND FEDERALISM*

The forthcoming celebration of the Bicentennial of the framing of the United States Constitution provides us all with a special opportunity to re-examine our national charter and the unique federal system it established. An important debate concerning the need to refer to the intent of the Framers in interpreting the Constitution already is under way.¹ That there should be a debate over this issue seems curious to me, since judges and lawyers always begin their analysis of any document with an inquiry into the intention of the parties. It would seem especially important that they do so with a document as significant as the Constitution.

Tonight, however, I open the discussion on a different front, hoping perhaps to trigger another debate. I begin with the proposition that the enlarged criminal jurisdiction of the federal courts has led to an increasing federalization of the criminal law. Whether that proposition invokes a challenge to the system of dual sovereignty established by the Framers of our Constitution is the question I propose for debate. The discussion should be of particular interest to those concerned with maintaining the traditional functions of the states and the vitality of the tenth amendment. Historically, of course, the detection, apprehension, prosecution and punishment of those accused of anti-social conduct have been considered state functions of the most basic kind.

As I see it, the growing use of the federal courts for criminal prosecutions is attributable to three factors: ongoing congressional interest in the development of new criminal legislation; expansive interpretation of federal criminal statutes by the courts; and the demands of state and local governments for federal assistance in criminal law enforcement.
Add to these factors the vigor of some federal prosecutors in filling the gaps perceived to exist in state prosecutions, and we have the makings of a glut that threatens to overwhelm the federal courts -- courts that were designed to handle a limited number of crimes affecting national interests.

The restricted role intended for the federal government in regard to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction is apparent from a reading of the Constitution itself. Jurisdiction over criminal matters is referred to specifically in the Constitution only in four of the enumerated powers of Congress: the power to provide punishment for counterfeiting securities and coin; the power to punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations; the power to exercise jurisdiction at the seat of government and in federal enclaves; and the power to punish treason. Obviously, the Framers expected that general criminal jurisdiction would remain with the States. James Madison put it this way in No. 45 of the Federalist Papers:

The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the federal government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State.7

Despite the limitations envisioned by Madison, the Constitution delegates to Congress a number of broad-ranging enumerated powers dealing with various matters of domestic concern. The Constitution also confers upon Congress the power to enact laws necessary and proper for the execution of those enumerated powers and for the execution of all other powers vested in the officers, departments and government of the United States. The authority to adopt criminal legislation is derived from these provisions in our national charter. For example, the first criminal statute, enacted by the first Congress in 1789, defined certain customs offenses8 and was based on the enumerated power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports and excises. The Crimes Act of 1790, the earliest federal criminal code, established penalties for four categories of prohibited activities within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government: felonies committed on the high seas; offenses directly affecting the operations of government; crimes committed within federal enclaves; and interference with the functioning of the federal courts.⁹ The offenses sanctioned in the Crimes Act either were mentioned specifically in the Constitution or established under the authority of the necessary and proper clause.

The Judiciary Act of 1789 divided jurisdiction for the trial of crimes against the United States between the District Courts and the Circuit Courts.¹⁰ As originally constituted, the Circuit Courts consisted of one District Judge and two Supreme Court Justices and had both trial and appellate jurisdiction. The Act conferred upon the United States District Courts jurisdiction over all crimes and offenses "cognizable under the authority of the United States committed within their respective districts, or upon the high seas, where no other punishment than whipping not exceeding thirty stripes, a higher fine than one hundred dollars, or a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months, is to be inflicted."¹¹ Jurisdiction over crimes calling for greater punishments was vested in the Circuit Courts.

The very limited jurisdiction of the District Courts was the cause of some inefficiency in the early criminal justice system. The minutes of the Supreme Court dated February 8, 1791 include a copy of a letter from James Duane, first Judge of the District of New York, to Chief Justice John Jay. Duane advised that he had committed to custody one Goreham, Master of the Sloop Hiram, for "Breach of Revenue Laws aggravated by Perjury" and one Seely, mate aboard the same vessel, for landing a cargo of coffee at night without reporting. Noting that he was without jurisdiction to try these offenses by reason of the extent of punishment involved, Judge Duane requested that a Circuit Court be convened in New York, and it was so ordered by the Supreme Court.¹²

It was not until 1891 that the Circuit Courts became Circuit Courts of Appeals, exercising appellate jurisdiction only. Now, of course, the District Courts have original jurisdiction of all offenses against the laws of the United States.¹³ Some lawyers describe the present-day Courts of Appeals as courts for the correction of District Courts' errors and for the perpetuation of their own. District Judges compare Circuit Judges to soldiers who come onto the battlefield after the battle is over and shoot the wounded. One of my District Judge friends swears that he once read an Appeals Court opinion containing these words: "We reverse, substantially for the reasons stated in the decision of the Court below."

A significant expansion of the criminal jurisdiction of the federal courts to cover crimes traditionally punished under state law came about in the Reconstruction Period following the Civil War. Until that time, federal criminal law generally was restricted to conduct directly affecting the functions and operations of the national government. The original mail fraud statute, enacted in 1872 as part of a legislative package dealing with the post office, was remarkable as an extension of federal authority into an area formerly thought to be of state concern only.¹⁴ To be sure, the statute was enacted in furtherance of the constitutional power of Congress to establish post offices and post roads, and, despite several amendments over the years, proof of its violation still requires a showing of use of the mails to establish jurisdiction. The jurisdictional requirement has become attenuated, however, by virtue of the Supreme Court decision holding that the requirement is fulfilled if the use of the mails can be reasonably foreseen in connection with the scheme to defraud.\textsuperscript{15}

Court decisions defining the scope of the fraudulent conduct proscribed also have extended the reach of mail fraud prosecutions. Originally designed to prevent the misuse of the postal system, the mail fraud statute has evolved by judicial interpretation into a vehicle for the prosecution of an almost unlimited number of offenses bearing very little connection to the mails and ordinarily prosecuted in the state courts. Cases involving official corruption on the state and local level have been introduced into the federal courts under the umbrella of mail fraud, with the courts finding actionable fraud where the corrupt officials can be said to have deprived the citizenry of intangible rights to their honest, loyal and faithful services. Ironically, this theory of breach of fiduciary duty found expression in a case in which the court said: "We are cognizant of the problem of the ever expanding use of the mail fraud statute to reach activities that heretofore were considered within the exclusive domain of State regulation."\textsuperscript{16}
In recent years the courts have sustained mail fraud convictions of a local political leader, whose special relationship with the local government was considered sufficient to impose a public duty upon him;\textsuperscript{17} of an employee said to have breached a duty to disclose material information to his employer;\textsuperscript{18} of a corporate officer for diversion of corporate funds to unknown purposes;\textsuperscript{19} and of an attorney for a fraud generated by a conflict of interest.\textsuperscript{20} A similarly broad range of activity is encompassed by the wire fraud statute, the twin of the mail fraud provision. Under that statute, the conviction of a man who established a bogus talent agency for the purpose of meeting and seducing young women was affirmed.\textsuperscript{21}

Chief Justice Burger has written that "[w]hen a 'new' fraud develops -- as constantly happens -- the mail fraud statute becomes a stopgap device to deal on a temporary basis with the new phenomenon, until particularized [federal] legislation can be developed and passed to deal directly with the evil."\textsuperscript{22} To my mind, that statement raises these important issues: whether there is a need for a proliferation of criminal statutes to deal with matters already covered under the mail fraud heading; whether the expanded interpretation of mail fraud implicates the sixth amendment right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; and, most important, whether there is a place for state criminal law in the formulation of responses to new varieties of fraud.
As a fount of federal criminal jurisdiction, the power of Congress to establish the post office pales into insignificance in comparison with its power to regulate commerce among the several states. At the turn of this century, Congress found the need to respond to problems the states could not resolve and began to enact criminal legislation to fulfill that need under the guise of protecting the channels of interstate commerce. The Lottery Act, prohibiting the transportation of lottery tickets in interstate commerce, and the Mann Act, prohibiting the movement of women across state lines for prostitution, were early examples of such laws. In upholding the constitutionality of these two Acts, the Supreme Court rejected tenth amendment violation arguments as well as contentions that the commerce power was not broad enough to support the legislation. Thus reinforced by the Supreme Court, Congress pushed on to adopt new criminal statutes purportedly protective of interstate commerce channels, supposedly responsive to problems unreachable by state law and always intrusive into areas previously of exclusive state concern: transportation of stolen vehicles; kidnapping; flight to avoid prosecution; and theft from interstate commerce.

When the Supreme Court upheld the authority of Congress under the commerce clause to regulate intrastate activity affecting interstate commerce, the stage was set for the most expansive intervention of the federal government in crime control since the beginning of the Republic. This extremely broad interpretation of the commerce power has enabled Congress to provide for the prosecution of local racketeering under the Hobbs Act, which punishes those who affect commerce by robbery or extortion; the Travel Act, which prohibits interstate travel to promote various forms of unlawful activity; the Extortionate Credit Transaction Act, which outlaws extortionate credit transactions or "loansharking" and, in recent years, the all-purpose Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.

Whether the Constitution permitted the enactment of the federal loan shark statute was the issue before the Supreme Court in Perez v. United States. In my opinion, the Court's affirmative answer to that question marked an astounding change in the concept of federal criminal jurisdiction. The Court there held that a local loan shark could be convicted without any showing of a nexus between his activities and interstate commerce. The basis for jurisdiction was found in a congressional determination that interstate commerce was affected by a tie-in between the class of all extortionate credit transactions and organized crime. Justice Stewart's dissent in Perez, however, seems compelling. He wrote:

[i]t is not enough to say that loan sharking is a national problem, for all crime is a national problem. It is not enough to say that some loan sharking has interstate characteristics, for any crime may have an interstate setting. And the circumstance that loan sharking has an adverse impact on interstate business is not a distinguishing attribute, for interstate business suffers from almost all criminal activity, be it shoplifting or violence in the streets.

Despite the Stewart dissent, it now seems certain that a congressional declaration that a particular activity affects commerce is sufficient to invoke the interstate commerce power as the basis for federal criminal legislation. Such a declaration is included in the Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, where Congress made the finding that "[f]ederal control of the intrastate incidents of the traffic in controlled substances is essential to the effective control of the interstate incidents of such traffic." Having thus generated its own jurisdictional base, the statute goes on to authorize, among other things, federal prosecution of the otherwise local crimes of possession, distribution and manufacture of narcotics and dangerous drugs.

Thus it is that local trafficking in controlled substances, as well as local fraud, loansharking, theft, racketeering, municipal corruption and all other crimes involving matters primarily of local concern have become grist for the federal prosecutor's mill. As I see it, the ongoing federalization of the criminal law has brought with it some very significant constitutional and pragmatic problems. The problems are these:

- Unrealistic expectations. In 1985, a total of 39,500 criminal cases were filed in the ninety-four United States District Courts. During the same period, more than 51,000 criminal cases were filed in the Superior Courts of the New York State Court System alone. The Criminal Court of the City of New York is said to handle 280,000 misdemeanor cases each year. Last year, there were 55,000 narcotics arrests in New York City. Nationwide, for the same period, there were but 5,623 marihuana, controlled substance and narcotics cases filed for consideration by 575 United States District Judges. Between 1984 and 1985, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York sustained an increase in its total criminal caseload of 51.5%, from 695 to 1,053 cases. Is it realistic to expect that the federal courts in New York City can shoulder 10% of the City's drug cases, as suggested by the State Administrative Judge? Does it make sense to designate state prosecutors as federal prosecutors for this purpose, as proposed? From whence are to come the necessary court facilities and personnel? It simply is unrealistic to expect that the federal courts ever will be able to make the slightest inroads in handling the cases arising out of the tens of thousands of narcotics and other crimes committed in the nation in each year.

-Diversion of scarce federal resources. This problem was delineated in a decision of my Court in a narcotics distribution case we heard last year. As a member of the panel issuing that decision, I was privileged to concur in the opinion of a colleague, who wrote as follows:

Though the case was developed by New York City police officers, concerns readily visible criminal conduct requiring no special investigatory resources or equipment, and involves a $30 transaction, the matter became the subject of a federal criminal prosecution because it occurred on "federal day," the day of the week when federal law enforcement authorities have decided to convert garden-variety state law drug offenses into federal offenses. Though we are urged in other contexts to tolerate missed deadlines because of the enormous burdens placed upon limited numbers of federal law enforcement personnel, . . . on "federal day" there are apparently enough federal prosecutors available with sufficient time to devote to $30 drug cases that have been developed solely by state law enforcement officers. Be that as it may, the case is lawfully within the jurisdiction of the federal courts and must be decided.1

The obvious question presented by the decision is this: Should the federal courts be used for the prosecution of $30 "buy and bust" cases? I suggest that it might be a better use of resources to reserve federal courts for the prosecution of major interstate and international trafficking in those pernicious substances that have become a modern-day plague in our nation. The same considerations should apply to other crimes as well -- federal prosecution should be limited to misconduct affecting clearly defined national interests.

-Duplication of effort in law enforcement. It seems inevitable that problems will arise when state and local prosecutors have the authority to prosecute the same acts as violations of both state and federal law. Sometimes, there are unseemly "turf" wars, as was seen recently in New York City in connection with investigations into allegations of municipal corruption.42 Sometimes, of course, there are clashes over who should be prosecuting crimes in mutual jurisdiction situations, as demonstrated in regard to drug prosecutions in this City.43 Always, there is the spectre of duplication, waste and destructive competition for the taxpayer's law enforcement dollar. Although there is no constitutional bar to punishing a person twice for one act offensive to both federal and state sovereigns, is it necessary? Is it efficient? I suggest that the public interest is not well served by duplication of effort in law enforcement.

- Unbridled discretion of federal prosecutors. As Congress defines ever more crimes, it becomes inevitable that federal prosecutors gain ever more discretion to decide what crimes they will prosecute. This is so because the expansion of federal law enforcement agencies, prosecutors and courts cannot keep pace with the proliferation of federal crimes. Federal district attorneys therefore must become very selective as to the crimes they will prosecute and those they will decline to prosecute. These appointed officials thus acquire the greatest power in the law enforcement field, because to them is entrusted the authority to decide which cases they will bring to court and which they will not. An attorney recently told me of the great effort he was making to persuade a United States Attorney not to prosecute his client for a state sales tax violation. (The prosecution was threatened under the mail fraud statute, of course.) My impression was that the case would be won or lost on the question of the exercise of discretion. Where there are many criminal violations but only a few can be chosen for prosecution, the prosecutor invades the province of the lawmaker. There is then a public perception that the process is unfair.

- Loss of the capacity for self-government. The citizenry increasingly has been conditioned to turn to federal law enforcement and to the federal courts as the first line of defense against anti-social conduct. What we are witnessing is an abdication of responsibility for self-government, reflected in the attitudes and lack of accountability of those chosen to govern on the state and local level. In the face of municipal corruption, it is easy to send for the "federals." If narcotics are sold on the street corners of a major city, it is a simple matter to invoke high-profile federal criminal prosecution. When loan sharks and racketeers infest a municipality, local law enforcement efforts can be relaxed if federal help is on the way. But something is lost in the process -- the traditions of democratic self-government and of individual involvement and neighborly concern that have been the hallmarks of our society.
To invite federal authorities to define and prosecute crime involving activities primarily of state and local interest is to concede that state and local government cannot be moved to serve the will of the people. I do not believe that the American people are prepared to make that concession.

Before there is a complete merger of state and federal law,
the following steps might be considered:

- Congress should undertake a study of each and every criminal statute, identifying those dealing with matters of true national interest and discarding all others.

- No new federal criminal legislation should be enacted without assessing the impact of the legislation on federal courts and other federal resources.

- Consideration should be given to conferring upon state courts jurisdiction over certain federal crimes. This is not a new concept; it has roots in the early days of our judicial system.44

-The Department of Justice should develop, enforce and widely disseminate precise guidelines circumscribing the exercise of discretion by United States Attorneys.45 These guidelines should proscribe duplication of state prosecution.

-Mail fraud and other criminal statutes given expansive interpretation by the Courts because of imprecise statutory language should be studied with a view toward adopting more specific descriptions of the conduct prohibited.46

-The excellent program introduced by the Department of Justice to promote cooperation and coordination among local, state and federal law enforcement agencies should be expanded and encouraged.47

The criminal law is but one area where Congress has intruded into, and displaced the functions of, the states. But it is the duty of Congress, just as much as it is the duty of the judicial and executive branches, to maintain that deliberately measured allocation of authority between the states and the federal government provided by the Constitution. Given the "underdeveloped capacity [of Congress] for self-restraint,"48 to use a phrase coined by Justice O'Connor, there may be some doubt whether the legislative branch has any great enthusiasm for that duty. Chief Justice Marshall wrote that the power of Congress under the commerce clause is restrained by "[t]he wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections. . . ."49
These same factors are implicated in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction under the commerce clause and in the whole issue of the state-federal criminal law dichotomy. Of these factors, the most important is the influence of the electorate, because in this democratic society the proper direction of our federal system can be determined only by the people.
FOOTNOTES

*All rights reserved.

2. The tenth amendment provides: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." U.S. Const. amend. X.

5. U.S. Const. art. 1, § 8, cl. 17.

6. U.S. Const. art. 3, § 3.

9. Act of April 30, 1790, ch. 9, § 1, 1 Stat. 112.

10. Judiciary Act of 1789, § 9, 1 Stat. 73.

11. Id. § 4.

31. Id. at 157-58 (Stewart, J., dissenting).

34. New York State Unified Court System: Superior Court -- Criminal Terms, Executive Summary 3 (1986).

39. Fox, supra note 35, at 2, col. 5.
45. See generally Schwartz, Federal Criminal Jurisdiction and Prosecutors' Discretion, 13 Law & Contemp. Probs. 64 (1948).
47. Under this program, the individual United States Attorneys have organized Law Enforcement Coordinating Committees to achieve the program's goals.