With our campus in the heart of Manhattan’s civic center, it’s not surprising that New York Law School graduates are highly represented in the public service sector.

This issue of New York Law School Magazine focuses on our leadership in prosecution—a field whose national spotlight continues to grow. Prosecutors, in exercising the sovereign power of the state and working on behalf of “the people,” hold a fundamentally unique role in our society and exert a great deal of influence in our justice system. They must continually balance concerns about safety, justice, and ethics. Talk to career prosecutors, and they’ll tell you that the role is not so much a job as a calling.

NYLS’s approach to teaching prosecution is, in many ways, emblematic of our overall philosophy. Our coursework is modern, practical, grounded in ethics, and connected to the dense urban environment in which we operate. Yet, prosecution is also a field in which we stand out among our peers. We offer not one, but two prosecution clinics, connect students to the latest innovators through uncommon partnerships, provide specialized ethics training, and much more. And it doesn’t hurt that we’re the only law school in lower Manhattan.

I invite you to read more about our latest offerings and to meet some of the many NYLS graduates who are shaping 21st-century prosecution.

Anthony W. Crowell
Dean and President
Professor of Law
For as long as she can remember, Professor Tamara Belinfanti has been rankled by injustice.

“I’m very worried anytime I see someone’s voice being silenced, even if I disagree with them,” she says. “I’m driven by protecting and creating a path for those who may not have a voice.”

Her latest work—a new book titled Citizen Capitalism: How a Universal Fund Can Provide Influence and Income to All and the Ethical Shareholder Initiative, a nonprofit project she co-created—reflects the close eye Professor Belinfanti keeps on justice and representation, and the creative ways she’s applying those passions to her expertise in corporate governance.

In Citizen Capitalism, Professor Belinfanti and her co-authors (Cornell law professors Sergio Gramitto and the late Lynn Stout) lay out their proposal for a national fund that would be similar to a mega mutual fund and open to all Americans ages 18 and up. Called the Universal Fund, it would offer every citizen a single share, a proportion of returns generated by the fund, and shareholder voting rights. The book suggests establishing the fund with donations from corporations and ultra-wealthy individuals.

In a recent conversation with New York Law School Magazine, Professor Belinfanti shared details on the book’s Universal Fund proposal and the Ethical Shareholder Initiative. The conversation has been edited for length and clarity.
Universal basic income isn’t a new idea—some trace it all the way back to Thomas More’s Utopia from the 16th Century—but the Universal Fund takes a different tack. Can you talk about how the Universal Fund is different and why you believe it’s a better approach?

Universal basic income proposals tend to either rely on government funding or government-directed redistribution of wealth. The Universal Fund does not rely on either. You can think of it as a private solution to a civic problem. Rather than just giving people money, we’re giving citizens a financial incentive to participate in our shareholder system, and through that, to address issues that impact every citizen. We view it as a win-win. It’s a win in terms of this income source, which could be very significant for some people, and the second win is broad participation in corporate governance.

You bring up the income element. How large would the fund need to be to make a significant difference in people’s finances?

Like any financial incentive, most of the impact will be felt by the people who have the least. We give a fair amount of space in the book to running some numbers to explain what we view as the potential. [...][See sidebar on page 4.]

Also, the fund is designed to grow over time because you’re not allowed to sell, divest, bequeath, or put a lien on your share. A good comparison is the Alaska Permanent Fund. When it started off in 1977, it was fairly minimal. Today, each citizen is getting somewhere between $1,000 to $2,000 annually. To me, that’s a significant amount. Examples like that show the potential of a Universal Fund.

Your sample scenarios rely on a starting fund with trillions of dollars. That means you would need major donations from corporations or ultra-wealthy individuals. How would you sell them on putting up that kind of money to establish the fund?

In the book, we talk a lot about why we believe the private money is there. On the corporate side, S&P 500 companies are spending between $400 billion and $650 billion on share repurchases annually, and those shares are just sitting on their books. They could easily be donated to the Universal Fund. That’s a simple way to start.

Then when you look at something like the Giving Pledge—people who are pledging to give away some percentage of their wealth—those numbers are significant, and they’re growing every day. In a way, we are leveraging the natural incentive that people already have to give. Wealth inequality is on people’s radars, but they’re not sure how best to address it. We’ve done the heavy lifting of constructing a framework.

Let’s shift to the Ethical Shareholder Initiative (ESI). What are the goals behind that project and how does it relate to Citizen Capitalism?

ESI is an independent nonprofit project started by myself and Professor Lynn Stout, with the belief that shareholders can be a positive force for both business and social concerns. Lynn passed away in April 2018. She was an internationally recognized expert in corporate governance and business ethics. At ESI, we’re building a platform for shareholders to make voting decisions with ethical, social, and environmental concerns in mind. While the book lays out a theoretical framework for the types of proxy advisory services that would serve the true long-term interests of a shareholder, ESI is exploring how we could provide those services in practice. We’re funded by the Ford Foundation, and we’ll be based on NYLS’s campus as part of the new Social Justice Organization Incubator.

In general, what concerns you most about our current corporate climate?

What I see is a doubling down by those who hold the traditional view that it’s about profits and financials—and that questions about sustainability are tangential. I understand from a human nature perspective why you would double down if this is what you built your career on, but I worry that it’s shortsighted. Somebody called me, at a conference, “part of the progressive corporate law group.” I’d never heard the term before. I said, “I didn’t even know that’s a thing, but what’s so bad about being progressive?”
ECONOMIES OF SCALE

225 million people

2.25-percent dividend rate

A fund in the trillions

Annual dividends of $100+

“As a starting point, we take the current census estimates of how many U.S. citizens age 18-plus we currently have. That comes out to 227 million adults over age 18. We don’t expect everybody to sign up to become a citizen shareholder. Let’s assume the max who sign up is 225 million.

“We take the average dividend rate for the past few years. We assume 2.25 percent for stocks in the fund portfolio. Assuming 225 million people sign up, a $1 trillion fund generates $100 per person annually; $10 trillion: $1,000; $30 trillion: $3,000.

“Depending on where you sit on the financial ladder, $100 may not make a difference to you. But when you look at the literature—people who are living on the edge, particularly the working poor—it becomes significant.”

–Professor Tamara Belinfanti

This brave book, coming on the heels of the first author’s equally bold The Shareholder Value Myth, takes on an even bigger challenge. Its goal is to bring together civil engagement and corporate governance, free enterprise and cooperative participation, through the creation of a universal shareholder fund. Based on a mutual fund model, the proposal would broaden access, bend income distribution, and shift the leverage points in our political system away from oligarchic elites. Citizen Capitalism will contribute to the debate about the responsibility of the corporation for contributing to the public good as well as private profit.

–Sidney Tarrow, Emeritus Professor of Government, Cornell University and author of Power in Movement

This book offers a transformative plan to make corporate ownership and governance more inclusive. It attempts to harness corporate power and resources in the tackling of the challenges of poverty and empowerment. At the heart of the book is the relationship between corporations and society. Through their proposal, the authors strive for a synergic relationship benefitting society. With clinical precision and an extraordinary grasp of history, the book offers a brilliant diagnosis of critical issues facing the world in the field of corporate governance. This is an important and valuable book. It reminds us that the only legitimate end of corporate governance is the well-being of society.

–Muna Ndulo, Professor of Law; Elizabeth and Arthur Reich Director, Leo and Arvill Berger International Legal Studies Program; and Director of the Institute for African Development

Corporations—like governments—play an essential role in the lives of every American. But most Americans have an extremely limited ability to influence corporate decision-making, and we all live with the consequences. Stout, Gramitto, and Belinfanti offer a bold and creative alternative: What if we had a tool that gave every American a say in how corporations are run—like a superpowered pension fund that made corporations accountable to more than the bottom line? This is a powerful and timely idea, and Citizen Capitalism makes the case extraordinarily well.

–Deborah N. Archer, Associate Professor of Clinical Law, New York University School of Law and former Professor of Law, NYLS

Citizen Capitalism offers fresh thinking at a critical point in our understanding of the effects of shareholder capitalism—from scholars who effectively bridge theory and the practical world of investment, markets, and citizen communities. This book offers an audacious plan on how to use the rules of capitalism to address inequality. I strongly recommend it.

–Judy Samuelson, Executive Director, Business and Society Program, The Aspen Institute

The very bold plan to democratize corporate governance detailed by Stout, Gramitto, and Belinfanti in Citizen Capitalism is sure to be controversial in some circles, but it will also catalyze long-overdue discussions about the role of business in our society. Read this book.

WHAT PEOPLE HAVE SAID ABOUT CITIZEN CAPITALISM
In September 2018, NYLS held its Alumni Reunion, honoring classes ending in 3 and 8. The celebration brought 60 years of alumni back to campus, from the Class of 1958 to the Class of 2018. Attendees enjoyed a full day of opportunities to learn and network, from a CLE on fostering diversity in the legal profession to a discussion with Dean Anthony W. Crowell and administrative staff on the School’s progress and planning and a forum on the Post-Kennedy Supreme Court. Reunion ended with a popular rooftop reception, and, for those who weren’t yet done catching up, an Alumni Association after-party. The following morning, NYLS held its Third Annual Hall of Judges Ceremony, honoring alumni who serve at all levels of the judiciary and across all jurisdictions. The day included a tribute to the Honorable Nicholas Tsoucalas ’51. Judge Tsoucalas, who passed away on March 22, 2018, served as a jurist for 50 years, including 18 as a New York City and New York State Supreme Court Judge, and 32 years on the U.S. Court of International Trade. Dean Crowell, Vice President for Institutional Advancement Marcey L. Grigsby ’06, Judge Tsoucalas’s daughters and grandchildren, and his former colleagues reflected on his extraordinary contributions to the legal profession and NYLS. In his memory, and with the support of alumni and friends, NYLS established the Judge Nicholas Tsoucalas ’51 Scholarship Fund to benefit future NYLS students.

The next NYLS Alumni Celebration is May 3, 2019. All alumni are invited, and the School will honor classes ending in 4 and 9. Visit www.nyls.edu/celebration for more.
Business of Law Institute Sees an Active First Semester

NYLS announced its Business of Law Institute in July 2018. The new Institute focuses on the 21st-century technical and operational skills that will help NYLS graduates excel at law firms, corporations, and in government and public interest roles. Its development was guided by insights and recommendations from more than 100 leaders at major law firms and in the legal departments of global corporations. In the Institute’s first semester, its programming included a technology learning lab with the e-discovery software provider Relativity, as well as master classes in cyber incident response plans, artificial intelligence and smart contracts, and more. NYLS’s legal-tech initiatives have been highlighted in Above the Law, Bloomberg Big Law, The National Law Journal, and the blog What Great Law Schools Do.

SYMPOSIUM ASKS “WHAT IS REAL?” IN THE DIGITAL AGE OF FASHION

Symposium Asks “What Is Real?” in the Digital Age of Fashion

In September 2018, Dean Anthony W. Crowell co-hosted a webinar, “Redefining the Relationship Between Law School and Legal Practice,” presented by the American Bar Association Law Practice Division, along with Steven R. Harber ’92, head of legal partnerships at Seal Software; Ari Kaplan, Principal at Ari Kaplan Advisors; and Charles Post ’10, Managing Counsel and Director, as well as Head of Legal Data Management & Advisory, at BNY Mellon. In the fall 2018 issue of preLaw magazine, the School was ranked eighth among the ”Top 30 Law Schools for Legal Technology.” The Institute will continue to grow its offerings throughout 2019.
NYLS Adds New Resources for Academic Success and Bar Support

During the summer of 2018, NYLS welcomed a new Assistant Dean for Academic Success, Paulina Davis, and promoted Visiting Professor Cynara McQuillan ’03 to Assistant Dean for Bar Success. Deans Davis and McQuillan are focused on building a seamless continuum of academic support for all day and evening students that spans from the summer before the 1L year through the bar exam. In their first semester, they’ve already added new workshops for students, expanded early outreach to student bar takers, collaborated closely with the NYLS administration and faculty, and directed NYLS’s existing academic and bar support activities, including use of the industry-leading bar support software, AdaptiBar. A generous gift from Arthur Metzler ’94 will fund the tool for all Evening Division bar takers in 2019. Dean Davis is an experienced educator and mentor who previously served as Acting Assistant Professor in the New York University School of Law Lawyering Program. Dean McQuillan brings many years of exceptional teaching experience at NYLS, including as Interim Director of NYLS’s Academic Success Program. She also served as Assistant Director of Bar Programs and Academic Development at another New York City-area law school.

New Clinic Provides Free Transactional Legal Services to Local Businesses and Nonprofits

NYLS’s new Nonprofit and Small Business Clinic has been remarkably busy since its fall 2018 launch. The clinic provides free transactional legal services to groups that serve, or are run by, traditionally marginalized people. Associate Professor Gowri Krishna, an expert in community economic development and worker-owned cooperatives, guides the clinic’s six students in their field work. Operating in pairs, students advise two to three client organizations on projects such as developing employment policies and handbooks, making decisions about governance, evaluating tax exemptions, and negotiating leases and other contracts. The clinic also engages students in the broader racial and economic disparities their clients seek to address and includes seminar courses on ethics, counseling, and interviewing. As of the fall 2018 semester, clients included Emma’s Torch, which trains refugees in culinary skills and operates a Brooklyn restaurant; DREAM!, a Bronx-based group that teaches young people mediation and conflict-resolution skills; the Association for Neighborhood and Housing Development, a coalition that advocates for affordable housing; Brooklyn Kindergarten Society, an early education provider to young children living in public housing; Coopportunity, a franchisor of worker-owned cleaning businesses; La Fortaleza Community Development Corporation, an organization that protects and amplifies arts in Harlem; a nonprofit that helps people transition out of homelessness; and a women-run collective of food caterers.
In a Tribeca penthouse, surrounded by 360-degree views of Manhattan, hundreds of leaders in law, business, and public service celebrated four powerhouse NYLS alumni.

The School’s 2018 Gala—themed “NYLS Powers Our Business and Civic Communities”—honored Karen Artz Ash ’80, John D. McMahon ’76, Julie Muniz ’97, and James Tricarico Jr. ’77 for their leadership in law and embodiment of NYLS’s core values. The four distinguished alumni were joined by colleagues, clients, family, and friends at the celebration, held on November 15, 2018.

Ash, McMahon, Muniz, and Tricarico have made names for themselves as influential leaders in industries that are critical to the New York City and global economies. Ash is a renowned intellectual property expert in the fashion industry, McMahon has led the region’s most critical energy infrastructure companies, Muniz provides sought-after business immigration counsel to companies building diverse global workforces, and Tricarico guided the financial services sector through unprecedented periods of change. All four have played equally vital roles as supporters of NYLS and its students.

The honorees shared touching accounts of how NYLS was instrumental in their professional success and why they decided to invest in its students and programs. Dean Anthony W. Crowell reflected on the values NYLS instills in all of its graduates, including civic engagement and service to those in need.

The speakers included Thomas Falcone, CEO of the Long Island Power Authority; Christopher Lewis, Principal and General Counsel at Edward Jones; other distinguished members of the legal profession; and student leaders Ehi Borha 4L Evening, Ally Simels 3L, and Barbie Melendez 4L Evening.

NYLS’s annual Gala raises funds for career-changing student scholarships, innovative academic programs and legal clinics, and cutting-edge faculty research. Alumni who would like to create opportunities for the next generation of leaders can join NYLS’s giving community at www.nyls.edu/give.

In spring 2018, NYLS was ranked No. 4 nationally in preLaw magazine’s top law schools for “Public Service—Public Defender/Prosecutor”
A PUBLIC INTEREST FOCUS

At NYLS, prosecution-track and defense-track students affiliate with the same academic center: the Impact Center for Public Interest Law. As a result, future prosecutors take common courses with future defense attorneys, including a required Professional Responsibility course specially tailored to criminal lawyers.

The shared experience “creates a really good conversation,” says Professor Rebecca Roiphe, a former Manhattan prosecutor, who teaches the ethics class. “Students tell me years later that those conversations stay with them throughout their careers.”

In addition, NYLS’s Brooklyn Prosecution Clinic partners with its Criminal Defense Clinic, which assists on Legal Aid Society cases. Students from the two clinics attend a joint three-week boot camp at the beginning of the clinics and an ongoing seminar about high-profile issues in the criminal justice system. One topic likely to generate discussion this year is New York’s “Sealing Law,” which took effect in October 2017 and allows people who have been convicted in no more than two cases (and no more than one felony) to apply to have their criminal convictions sealed. The Criminal Defense Clinic will begin assisting clients with these applications in spring 2019.

Professor Anna Cominsky ’05, who teaches the Criminal Defense Clinic, sees value in the dialogue. “Prosecutors have so much power,” she says. “They have the ability to change lives. Understanding the impact of a conviction and that there are alternatives to incarceration is vitally important.”

A STAND-OUT SIMULATION COURSE

Nearly any conversation about NYLS’s prosecution coursework includes mention of Advocacy of Criminal Cases. And it’s hard to imagine a simulation course more ambitious. The course manages to fit 6 credits and an entire simulated felony case into a single spring semester.

It’s a unique moment to be a prosecutor.

Headline-generating figures like Robert Mueller, Rod Rosenstein, Sally Yates, and Preet Bharara—NYLS’s 2017 Commencement speaker—have drawn national attention to the role of prosecutors and to intricate questions about prosecutorial independence and ethics, topics that rarely otherwise make their way onto cable news.

Meanwhile, individual prosecutors, including many at the local level, are reshaping their profession. In recent years, dozens of District Attorney’s offices around the country, including several in New York State, established conviction review units. Reform-minded prosecutors dedicated to addressing mass incarceration and racial inequities have been elected. Many prosecutors’ offices now take a public health approach to cases involving mental illness and drug misuse. And community courts, once considered experimental, have expanded in New York City and beyond. In short, it’s a fascinating time to join the field.

NYLS has long attracted and developed future prosecutors, as evidenced by its deep bench of alumni in the field. Today, from its campus in the heart of Manhattan’s Civic Center—and through its inventive practical training, focus on social justice, and exciting new partnerships, the School is securing its place as a premier training ground for 21st-century prosecutors.
Students are divided into teams of four, two prosecutors and two defense attorneys, and are told that an arrest has been made. Based on their roles, they interview either a “police officer” or a “defendant,” played by actors, and begin to pursue an investigation or mount a defense.

Because most students take Advocacy of Criminal Cases in their 2L year, it has become a cornerstone in future prosecutors’ training. It comes after foundational criminal law and procedure courses, Trial Advocacy (a simulation course on basic trial skills), and Professional Responsibility: Criminal Practice. And it’s a pre-cursor to the Criminal Prosecution and Defense clinics, as well as NYLS’s robust array of criminal justice externships. As a result, it’s a crucial bridge for students contemplating criminal justice careers, at a stage when they have both a solid foundation and the flexibility to pivot.

“Advocacy of Criminal Cases takes the silos we teach—Evidence, Crim Pro, Crim Law—and forces students to cut across all of those silos,” says Professor Frank Bress. He developed the course in 2003 and still teaches it.

The course “teaches students the fundamentals they need to try a criminal case and helps them decide which clinic they might take in their 3L year,” says Professor Anna Cominsky ’05, who also teaches it.

The simulated post-arrest interview is only the beginning. Students also draft a complaint, appear at the arraignment and bail hearing, prepare a grand jury presentation and grand jury charge, draft and file an indictment, conduct an investigation, make and respond to motions, conduct a suppression hearing, and work through an entire jury trial, including jury selection, with high school students playing jurors—all in a single semester.

“The whole course is built around teaching students to actively investigate the case through their own efforts,” Professor Bress says. “If the student prosecutors don’t do a good job, they can’t bring charges. It emulates reality.”

“Advocacy of Criminal Cases is a rich experience,” says Professor Mariana Hogan, who supervises a section of the course. “It becomes real to the students.”

“Not One, But Two Prosecution Clinics”

Many schools have a prosecution clinic. NYLS has two, a boon for future prosecutors. One clinic partners with the Kings County (Brooklyn) DA’s Office, the other with the New York County (Manhattan) DA’s Office. Adjunct Professor Charles Guria ’86, a longtime prosecutor in the Kings County DA’s Office, helped start the Brooklyn clinic in 2009 and was the first person to teach it.

“Our students work in the busiest part in criminal court, where they handle all manner of criminal cases,” he says. “By the end of the clinic, they’ve prosecuted between 20 and 25 cases. That kind of experience is invaluable when they go to a job interview.”

In the Manhattan clinic, every student handles their own caseload of quality-of-life offenses, working in a separate part of court from the Criminal Defense Clinic to avoid a conflict of interest. Three days a week, they’re in court, where they appear on the record all morning. Each fall, they undergo the same six-week orientation boot camp as rookie Manhattan Assistant District Attorneys.

Larken Kade, an experienced Manhattan ADA now teaching the fieldwork portion of the clinic for her third year, says that the student ADAs are treated as if they were first-year ADAs.

“They have to think about their impact on the community, the victims, and those we prosecute,” she says. “They are student ADAs for the people.”

Kade’s background includes prosecution of street crimes and sex crimes. This year, she’s co-teaching the fieldwork portion of the clinic with Wesley Cheng, a fellow ADA with experience in identify theft prosecutions who has worked at the New York State Attorney General’s Office.

Professor Lynn Su, a former Bronx ADA, co-teaches the seminar portion of the Manhattan Clinic with Kade and Cheng. The seminar complements the fieldwork and covers ethics, professionalism, and timely issues relating to the criminal justice system.

“There is a strong mentoring aspect to the clinic because the supervising attorneys work closely with the students on a regular basis and serve as role models,” Professor Su says. “In the seminar, we discuss case preparation and strategy. We also explore broad topics, such as prosecutors’ obligation to promote justice and the responsible exercise of prosecutorial discretion.”
In October 2018, NYLS launched its Office of Public Service and Pro Bono Initiatives, a single-stop resource for public service academic and career advising. Experienced public interest career advisor Swati Parikh is the office’s inaugural Executive Director.

Parikh runs targeted professional development sessions for future prosecutors, including mock interview programs that teach essential skills, like fielding criminal hypotheticals. She also brings in full-time prosecutors, often alumni, to meet with students and share advice.

“This is a really good community to come into if you want to be a prosecutor,” Parikh says. “Every year our students get hired at all of the prosecutors’ offices in the city, as well as in Westchester, Nassau, Suffolk, and New Jersey.”

The Office of Public Service and Pro Bono Initiatives is part of NYLS’s new Social Justice Hub, dedicated space on campus that houses both NYLS programming and external nonprofits. One is Fair and Just Prosecution, a leading national nonprofit that has built a network of newly-elected local prosecutors committed to fairness, equity, compassion, and fiscal responsibility. Another national organization, the Fines & Fees Justice Center, advocates to eliminate the harmful and unjust impacts of criminal justice system fines and fees.

Staff from both nonprofits operate out of NYLS’s campus, allowing students to work side-by-side with dynamic change-makers in the field.

An Experienced Prosecutor Joins NYLS’s Faculty

Alvin L. Bragg Jr. brings a wealth of public service expertise to his new role as Visiting Professor of Law at NYLS. Professor Bragg, who joined the School in January 2019, teaches criminal law courses and is Co-Director of NYLS’s Racial Justice Project.

He most recently served as Chief Deputy Attorney General for the New York State Attorney General’s Office, where he reported directly to the Attorney General and helped run the office of more than 1,500 people.

“One of the things I love most about government is that you get a lot of responsibility from a junior level and beyond,” he says. “Joining NYLS is a wonderful opportunity to help students navigate the beginning of their public service careers.”

Before he was appointed Chief Deputy Attorney General, Professor Bragg led the office’s Special Investigations and Prosecutions Unit, founded in 2015 to investigate law enforcement conduct resulting in the death of unarmed civilians. He joined the Attorney General’s Office in 2013 as Executive Deputy Attorney General for Social Justice, where he oversaw bureaus focused on charities, civil rights, environmental protection, health care, and labor issues.

His career before the Attorney General’s Office included the U.S. Attorney’s Office for the Southern District of New York, where he prosecuted white-collar and street crimes, and the New York City Council, where he oversaw the City Council’s litigation and investigations.

Professor Bragg has always been drawn to issues of government accountability.

“Whether it’s a bribery case involving midlevel public servants, excessive use of force by a police officer, or corruption by the former majority leader of the state Senate, it’s about protecting public integrity,” he says.

He’s excited about NYLS’s emphasis on practical training. The School currently houses more than 20 clinics and experiential learning courses in The Joe Plumeri Center for Social Justice and Economic Opportunity.

“Any law school would present the opportunity to develop new public service lawyers, but there are very few law schools with the same practical, real-world focus that NYLS has,” he says. “That’s what drew me to the School.”
A 360-DEGREE APPROACH

Increasingly, students who plan to become prosecutors are enrolling in NYLS’s Post-Conviction Innocence Clinic, which gives critical perspective on the outsized influence prosecutors exert.

“In our clinic, future prosecutors can learn how prosecutions go awry, how evidence can be distorted, and which reforms reduce the prevalence of wrongful convictions,” says Distinguished Adjunct Professor Adele Bernhard, who teaches the clinic.

The Post-Conviction Innocence Clinic has worked with Conviction Review Bureaus recently created by New York DAs, including in the Bronx, Brooklyn, and Suffolk County.

“Coursework in wrongful convictions is incredibly important,” says Professor Hogan, who began her career as a public defender.

Some NYLS students gravitate toward juvenile prosecutions, which are fundamentally rehabilitative and adjudicated in Family Court instead of Criminal Court. Professor Lisa Grumet teaches family law courses and leads NYLS’s Diane Abbey Law Institute for Children and Families.

“The juvenile justice system emphasizes both community safety and the best interest of the child,” Professor Grumet says. “There is a focus on alternative programs to help with the underlying issues that might have contributed to the child’s actions and to prevent future involvement in the adult criminal justice system.”

Students in NYLS’s new Children and the Law simulation course, which Professor Grumet co-teaches with Professor Samantha Pownall ’11, work through a mock juvenile delinquency hearing and study the juvenile system’s important distinctions in terminology, process, and outcomes. They also learn about attorneys’ roles in the education and child welfare systems.

Five graduates of the Class of 2018 joined the New York City Law Department’s Family Court Division, which oversees juvenile prosecutions in the five boroughs and expanded its staff dramatically following the passage of New York’s “Raise the Age” law. By October 2019, most 16-year-olds and 17-year-olds will be considered juvenile, not adult, offenders. The development is a watershed moment for the state and has dramatically increased the demand for family law attorneys.

NYLS is also involved in the growing area of restorative justice. Restorative justice techniques include youth courts and community courts, which use problem-solving to resolve nonviolent cases and often engage victims, as well as those

Staten Island District Attorney Michael McMahon ’85 Speaks About Combatting the Opioid Crisis

“Recognizing the significant challenges facing Staten Island as an epicenter in the heroin and prescription drug epidemic, I made this issue a central focus of my administration upon taking office as District Attorney in 2016. Since that time, my office has developed and deployed a multi-pronged plan that includes greater collaboration between law enforcement and the health care community in order to address both the supply and demand sides of the drug crisis.

“Working closely with the NYPD, we created New York City’s first Overdose Response Initiative to investigate overdose deaths as criminal investigations, which has led to the arrest and prosecution of Staten Island’s most dangerous drug dealers—individuals responsible for peddling deadly poison in our communities and preying on those suffering from addiction.

“At the same time, to address the substance abuse issue, my office created, then launched, several anti-drug initiatives, including the Heroin Overdose Prevention & Education (HOPE) program to expand treatment options and facilitate innovative early diversion opportunities for those suffering from addiction who find themselves in the criminal justice system. As we continue to fight every day against the scourge of heroin and opioids, I am proud to say that our combined efforts have helped save lives and hold criminals more accountable.”
Professor Rebecca Roiphe has been speaking and writing about prosecutorial ethics for more than 15 years. Now, as a contributing legal analyst at CBS News, she also appears regularly on national TV to unpack complex ethics questions about the President, the Department of Justice, and the FBI.

How has the way people think about prosecutors changed in the past couple of years?

In recent years, many people were learning about how problematic prosecutors could be, and it brought a great deal of attention to the criminal justice system and the reforms needed. But in the last two years, we’ve also seen how fundamentally important prosecutors are to American democracy and the rule of law.

As you’ve noted, the Supreme Court has never weighed in on the tradition of separation between U.S. Presidents and their Departments of Justice. Should it?

It’s a question that doesn’t come before the Supreme Court very frequently. President Nixon argued that he didn’t have to comply with the subpoena from the Department of Justice for his White House tapes because he controls the Department. But the Supreme Court didn’t address that question and instead ruled on narrower grounds that the tapes were not subject to executive privilege. Congress has, at times, also tried to weigh in on this question, and it hasn’t worked out well. When they created the position that ended up being Ken Starr, they made his role so independent that it was problematic. Ultimately, I think it would be helpful for the Court to weigh in.

You’re part of a robust network of fellow criminal justice professors. Why is scholarly exchange on these issues so vital?

I think it’s particularly important in this field. Aside from the major issues we see in the news, questions about prosecutorial norms, traditions, and cultures reach down to all levels of federal and state prosecution. That includes questions about how we can redirect prosecutors who’ve been too focused on convictions to think about the social justice issues and civil liberties of defendants in a more nuanced way. I’m proud to be among the scholars who have explored these questions for a long time.

As not only a former prosecutor but also a historian, what is your impression of watching people analyze these issues on a platform like Twitter, where immediacy is king?

Twitter places a premium on being incendiary and, of course, pithy. I like that it forces people to say things succinctly and that it brings a lot more voices into the conversation. But academics can lend critical perspective. When people are saying, “This never happened before!” we know that it did happen before and can provide nuance.

Are you seeing a rising interest in this field among students?

Yes, I think a lot of people are excited about prosecution and about public service in general right now. What’s great about NYLS is that so many of our graduates work at the local level of the criminal justice system, and their jobs affect many, many people. That adds to the excitement of both teaching and being NYLS students at this moment.

Prime Time for Prosecutorial Ethics

Professor Susan Abraham, who took a sabbatical to study the field, is a trained peacemaker and is taking the lead on planning activities and events, including a spring 2019 symposium. In summer 2018, students from the Charter High School for Law and Social Justice, founded by NYLS Professor Richard D. Marsico, became participants in the first-ever Bronx Youth Court.

“Restorative justice addresses both the underlying causes of crime and the effects of the criminal justice system on a community,” Professor Abraham says. “It means looking at individuals involved in the Criminal Justice system through a more human lens and seeing how we can find a way for both victims and perpetrators to turn things around.”

While she’s on “beeper duty” for the Queens District Attorney’s Office, Suzanne Bettis never knows when she’ll be summoned to an active crime scene or what she’ll find there: gunshot victims, fatal car crashes, suspicious deaths.

Those aren’t scenes that most lawyers ever see firsthand. But Bettis is an Assistant District Attorney in the Homicide Investigations Bureau, and a major part of her work is responding whenever an incident occurs in Queens County during one of her shifts. Often, it’s the middle of the night. Once at the scene, she might be tasked with writing search warrants or subpoenas, interviewing suspects or witnesses, drafting criminal charges, arraigning defendants, and generally ensuring that “everything is done within the letter of the law,” she says.

“As these cases are developing, you’re essentially an advisor to and a check on the NYPD so that collectively, we’re working in a constitutional manner,” she says. “To have an ADA there thinking about the legal issues and what we will eventually need for a trial makes a world of difference.”

It can be grisly work, but Bettis has more grit than most: a U.S. Marine, she served two tours of duty in Iraq, where she searched and recovered the bodies of deceased service members, identified and processed their remains, and sent them home to their families.

“I have a strong stomach,” she says. “I can go out to any scene and encounter anything, because I’ve already seen worse.”

Born in Kingston, Jamaica, Bettis and her family moved to the United States in the early 1990s. She enlisted in the Marines straight out of high school—but her long-term dream was law school. After her first deployment in 2006, she became a corrections officer, seeking to understand how her work as a future prosecutor could impact people’s lives. When her final deployment ended in 2007, she turned her focus to academics.

As a student at NYLS, Bettis started the School’s first Military Justice and Veterans Association to help other veterans and their dependents take full advantage of their Veterans Affairs educational benefits. She credits a 3L externship at the Manhattan DA’s Office with teaching her to think on her feet, balance a caseload, interview witnesses, and run a court calendar.

“I think Queens looked at that and expected that I’d be able to hit the ground running,” she says.

In her current role, Bettis finds deep satisfaction in helping those who have lost a loved one find justice and, she hopes, closure. It’s something that frustrated her as a Marine, where she couldn’t reveal specifics to families because details of combat operations are classified.

“They tell you in law school to find your niche,” Bettis adds. “Not everybody can withstand what I’m observing daily while also working efficiently as a lawyer. I’m just thankful that my work allows me to merge my experiences in the military with what I do now. Some people aren’t that lucky.”

As a rookie prosecutor in the Manhattan District Attorney’s Office, Sherene Crawford did shifts at Midtown Community Court, one of the country’s first “problem-solving” courts. Today, as the court’s Director, she trains new prosecutors on its unique approach to resolving low-level crimes.

In 1993, when the court opened in Midtown Manhattan, it was dubbed “a much-debated experiment” by The New York Times and met with criticism from prosecutors and defense attorneys alike. Twenty-five years later, groups from around the world visit to observe its model of restorative justice.

“The climate has changed over the past 25 years, but Midtown has always focused on our community and the individuals we work with,” Crawford says.

The court is operated by the Center for Court Innovation, a nonprofit. Its programs target common low-level offenses in Midtown, including prostitution and drug charges. The court arraigns cases for four local precincts and takes on borough-wide cases related to its specialty areas. Crawford’s team connects offenders to drug treatment, counseling, community service, and programs for sex trafficking victims.

In September 2018, Midtown launched an overdose avoidance and recovery part, in response to New York City’s opioid abuse epidemic. Participants can enter treatment without having to take a guilty plea.

Crawford wears many hats at the court, from
Charles Guria is a successful prosecutor who began his career on the other side of the table, as a staff attorney at The Legal Aid Society. That perspective has guided him since.

“As a defense attorney, I saw firsthand that a prosecutor wields tremendous power,” he says. “In my opinion, some wielded that power appropriately, and others didn’t. That was not lost on me when I came to prosecution work.”

Today, Guria is a Senior Assistant District Attorney working in parts of Central and South Brooklyn, in one of five trial zones his office has established. The zones are effective, Guria says, because ADAs get to know local police and the unique needs of each community.

“We focus on solutions that fit the neighborhood instead of blanket policies,” Guria says.

Guria joined the office in April 1990, a few months after Charles Hynes became Brooklyn’s District Attorney. Hynes was impressed by Guria’s work on a state disciplinary committee that investigated and prosecuted attorney misconduct. Guria, in turn, was inspired by Hynes’s approach to prosecution.

“It was a progressive and innovative DA’s office, especially for the era,” Guria says. “They focused resources on the most serious crimes and looked for alternatives on low-level crimes.”

Subsequent DAs Kenneth Thompson and Eric Gonzalez continued to keep the office in step with changing times, he says.

A few years into his job as a prosecutor, Guria took a leave of absence to serve on the Mollen Commission, an elite group that investigated widespread New York City police corruption in the early 1990s, leading to reforms. He was recruited to the Commission by former NYLS Adjunct Professor Harold Baer Jr., who was appointed to it by Mayor David Dinkins and who later became a federal judge. The experience taught Guria the value of cultivating mentors.

Guria got the chance to become a mentor himself when, more than nine years ago, he helped NYLS establish its Prosecution Clinic. Today, there are two prosecution clinics, one in Manhattan and one in Brooklyn, which Guria co-teaches.

“We train people as if they were first-year ADAs,” he says. “We teach them how to handle a case from the point we put the file in their hands until they stand up in court.” The students, he says, are eager to learn and keep him on his toes.

He also tries to impart life lessons to budding prosecutors. Having prosecuted hundreds of homicides and assaults over the years, Guria isn’t surprised when people ask if he’s jaded.

“What they don’t know is that I also see a lot of inspiring things,” he says. “I see people take the high road and do the right thing, even at their own risk.”
For Lawrence Piergrossi, a successful career as a prosecutor began with a random act of violence. In August 1993, Piergrossi, a lifelong New Yorker and then a senior in college, was shot in the neck by a stranger. He nearly died, and the perpetrator was never identified.

Nearly 25 years later, in December 2017, Piergrossi won the prestigious Thomas E. Dewey Medal, given to a member of each New York City District Attorney’s office who has performed with excellence. In a speech at the award ceremony, he called the Bronx District Attorney’s Office, where he has spent the past two decades, “the only place I ever wanted to work.”

Piergrossi enrolled at NYLS the year after the shooting, intent on pursuing justice for other victims. He credits the School with helping him secure a position in the Bronx DA’s office before he graduated. Today, he is Chief of Trial Bureau 50, where he supervises around 40 Assistant District Attorneys of all levels and handles his own high-profile caseload. He also oversees annual training programs for dozens of junior prosecutors.

Piergrossi has watched the office evolve over time, and he’s enthusiastic about the new initiatives DA Darcel Clark has implemented. In 2016, the office launched a special unit on Rikers Island to respond quickly to violent incidents with inmates. The same year, it shifted from a horizontal model of prosecution, in which different ADAs work on individual phases of the same case, to a vertical model, in which a single ADA handles the case from initiation to resolution.

“The vertical model lends itself to swifter and more effective prosecutions, and the ADAs who handle each case know it inside and out,” Piergrossi says. “There’s a much more holistic approach to being a prosecutor now, and that’s how it should be.”

Over the course of his career, he’s worked in the office’s Investigations, Special Victims, and Trial Divisions. As a result, he’s conducted pre-arrest investigations on offenses ranging from public corruption to gun trafficking; taken on cases of domestic violence, sex crimes, and crimes against children; and tried more than 50 cases to verdict, including homicides, violent felonies, and some of the office’s most politically-charged public corruption prosecutions.

One 2016 case involved the cover-up of an inmate beating by senior officials at the Department of Corrections, including a Chief. The three-and-a-half-month trial involved 10 defendants. Piergrossi landed convictions for nine. The pressure, he says, was intense.

“I had two veteran prosecutors sitting with me,” he says. “And we were facing off against a group of more than 10 defense and union lawyers, plus 50 to 60 members of the union in the courtroom daily.”

 Winning the Dewey Medal has brought his remarkable career into perspective.

“When I was notified about the medal, I said, really? Me? It was hard to wrap my mind around it, but I guess it’s my time.”

When Aimee Sklar-Calogero began law school, she wasn’t sure which field she would pursue, but she was certain that it wouldn’t involve litigation.

“It’s funny because now that’s what I do,” she says. But Sklar-Calogero isn’t a traditional litigator, or even a traditional prosecutor. Her role as Deputy Chief of the New York City Law Department’s Family Court Division involves responding to offenses—from shoplifting to homicide—committed by children and teenagers.

New York City’s juvenile justice system is wholly separate from the adult criminal justice system and uses distinct terminology. Acts that would be crimes if committed by adults are prosecuted by Law Department attorneys in Family Court, instead of by Assistant District Attorneys in Criminal Court.

“It’s a high-volume, fast-moving field, and some of the cases involve young people with extreme needs,” Sklar-Calogero says, referring to both the accused and the victims, who are often children themselves. “We have to determine how best to meet their needs while protecting the community.”

Sklar-Calogero joined the Family Court Division upon graduating from NYLS and served as a supervisor in Brooklyn and Queens, before becoming Chief of Staff. Now, as Deputy Chief of the Division, she oversees its administration, operations, and planning. Even though she doesn’t have her own caseload, she stays closely plugged into citywide case outcomes and helps ensure that the Division’s approach emphasizes rehabilitation over punishment.

“We’re constantly looking at available diversion programs, from youth court to mediation,” she says. She’s overseen the hiring of social workers, a psychologist, and staff who research new diversion programs.

In October 2018, Sklar-Calogero’s work changed substantially when New York City passed its long-anticipated “Raise the Age” legislation. The law changes the maximum age of juvenile delinquents from 15 to 16 for all misdemeanors and some felonies, removing some of the youngest defendants from the adult criminal justice system. In October 2019, the age will again raise to 17.

Sklar-Calogero played a central role in helping her team recruit, hire, and train a high volume of legal and support staff quickly to meet the increased need.

The daughter of New York City civil servants, Sklar-Calogero credits NYLS with exposing her to a wide variety of public service career options, and she was inspired by taking Professor Lenni Benson’s Civil Procedure class as a 1L.

“As a longtime prosecutor, Karen Varriale is used to hearing “like on Law & Order?” anytime she tells someone what she does for a living—and for many years, the answer was yes. But as of late 2017, Varriale has a different response. Now she explains that while she used to prosecute drug cases, robberies, sex crimes, and homicides, her new job is to keep low-level offenders out of the criminal justice system.

Based out of the Brooklyn DA’s Office, where she is a Senior Assistant District Attorney, Varriale runs Brooklyn CLEAR (Collaborative Legal Engagement Assistance Response). The program allows people who are arrested on a misdemeanor drug possession charge to avoid court and jail time simply by accepting help.

Through a peer assessment, they’re encouraged to pinpoint which services would make the biggest impact on their lives. It may be inpatient detox or outpatient methadone access, or it could just be help reworking a resume—leading to fresh job options—or obtaining a new ID card in order to secure Medicaid benefits.

“In our office, now the alternative is incarceration, and the mainstream is finding a solution,” Varriale says.

It’s a substantial shift from when she became a prosecutor in the late 1990s. She remembers when narcotics officers would sweep an entire housing project and bring in dozens of people in a single night for minor drug offenses. As a young prosecutor, it was Varriale’s job to help process, charge, and arraign them.

“Drug courts and problem-solving courts just didn’t exist in the early ’90s,” she says. “At the misdemeanor level, you didn’t offer treatment.”

Though she couldn’t have predicted the turn her career has taken, Varriale says she did know, from the time she first thought about law school, that she wanted to become a prosecutor. At NYLS, she found a mentor in Professor Robert Blecker—“I took every class he taught,” she says—and interned at the Brooklyn DA’s office and for a New York State Supreme Court Criminal Term Judge.

NYLS’s core criminal law classes "gave me a great foundation,” she says. Her experiences launched her straight into the Staten Island DA’s Office after graduation. She stayed there in various roles until 2017.

In 2015, Varriale won the Thomas E. Dewey Medal, which honors an outstanding ADA in each New York City District Attorney’s office. Soon after, she started work on Staten Island’s Overdose Response Initiative and its Heroin Overdose Prevention and Education (HOPE) Program. Like CLEAR, the HOPE program diverts low-level drug offenders into treatment rather than sending them through the criminal justice system.

Varriale says she’s come to see substance misuse disorder as a health issue rather than a crime—best treated with assistance, not punishment. “In our office, under DA Eric Gonzalez, our definition of success is saving lives and strengthening the community’s trust in the criminal justice system,” she says.

NYLS GRADUATES COME BACK TO THE CLASSROOM

Dozens of NYLS adjunct faculty members are not only accomplished practitioners—they’re also devoted alumni. A selection of alumni adjuncts shared their approach to teaching the next generation of NYLS graduates.

CHRISTOPHER BINNS ’12

Associate, Wilson Elser Moskowitz Edelman & Dicker LLP
Course: Advanced Legal Methodology

“I was once in my students’ shoes: a first-year law student trying to adjust to the demands of law school while learning how to speak and write about the law with authority. As a practicing attorney, I understand what is expected of students once they graduate. With these expectations in mind, I try to help my students determine an approach to solving legal problems that makes the most sense for them and will best serve them throughout their law school careers and beyond.”

JUDITH BRESLER ’74

Of Counsel, Withers Bergman LLP and co-author of Art Law: The Guide for Collectors, Investors, Dealers and Artists
Course: Art Law

“Having taught Art Law at NYLS for more than 20 years, I am impressed by my students’ level of engagement with this course. A number of them have decided to pursue Art Law as a field of practice, and it is particularly gratifying to me to come across one of them in later years on the opposite side of a negotiation!”

BERWIN COHEN ’99

Partner and Head of the New York Office, Wolffers Cohen & Edderai LLP

“Lawyers today must take a holistic general counsel approach in every engagement. NYLS’s tax courses focus on developing that approach, at a very high academic level, through inductive case-study, real-world application, and the creation of marketable skills to jump-start careers and professional advancement. In addition, teaching is an expression of gratitude for the quality education I received at NYLS and a chance to further promote the School’s prestige in the international business community.”

HEATHER ELLIS CUCOLO ’03

Owner and Partner, Mental Disability Law and Policy Associates, LLC
Courses: Criminal Procedure, Adjudication; Criminal Procedure, Investigation; Mental Disability Law and Criminal Law; Professional Responsibility for the Criminal Lawyer; and Sex Offenders

“My approach to teaching closely follows what I experienced as an NYLS student: a focus on the real-life application of legal principles, a push to think critically and analytically, and the importance of treating future clients with compassion and respect—even if society deems them to be the lowest of its members. I also share my stories and personal experiences as a trial attorney representing people labeled mentally ill and sexual predators. My hope is that every student leaves my courses feeling empowered and inspired to take on whatever lies ahead in their legal journey.”
A VITAL NEW LINK BETWEEN NYLS AND ADJUNCT FACULTY

Professor Howard S. Meyers was recently named Dean of Adjunct Faculty Engagement at NYLS. In the role—a newly created position—he’s forging deeper connections between NYLS and its community of accomplished adjunct faculty members. His work includes coordinating the appointment of new adjunct faculty members, ensuring they receive institutional training, counseling them on developing appropriate goals and outcome assessments for their courses, serving as a mentor, and linking them to other full-time faculty mentors based on subject matter. And Dean Meyers has already hit the ground running, with a survey of the adjunct faculty, undertaken as part of NYLS’s new five-year strategic plan. Its results will guide additional steps in 2019 and beyond.

DAVID FISH ’96
Counselor and Attorney at Law, David M. Fish P.C.; Athlete Manager
Courses: Drafting Contracts and Drafting General Principles

“I run my own solo practice law firm, where I practice employment law, commercial litigation, and criminal defense, among other areas. I also operate my combat sports management agency, MMA Fighter Management. Of the many things I do, teaching my students, acting as the NYLS Sports Law Society advisor, and staying connected to NYLS are the most rewarding. I cherish my ongoing relationship with NYLS, and my students keep me sharp and on my toes.”

JOHANNA MILLER ’08
Advocacy Director, New York Civil Liberties Union (NYCLU)
Course: Legislative Advocacy Clinic

“When I was a law student, it was challenging to find mentors and experience doing non-litigation policy advocacy. So in my teaching, I focus on exposing NYLS students to the entire spectrum of public interest lawyering beyond impact litigation. My work at NYCLU includes legislative advocacy, public education, community organizing, and media strategy, and I want my students to have access to all of those tools.”

JASMIN ELENA TORRES ’14
Housing Unit Staff Attorney, Manhattan Legal Services
Course: Housing Rights Clinic

“As an alum, it has always been important for me to give back to the community that gave me the tools necessary to shape the practitioner I am today. The Housing Rights Clinic is a wonderful opportunity for students interested in housing law to immerse themselves in the practice and gain invaluable hands-on experience. As someone who has always aspired to teach, it has been an honor to not only participate in the pilot year of this amazing clinic but to also say that one of my former clinic students is now my colleague!”

JUSTIN XENITELIS ’06
General Counsel and Vice President of Legal, Thor Equities, LLC
Courses: Commercial Leasing and Drafting Real Estate Documents

“As an NYLS student, some of my most memorable moments were when professors shared their real-world experiences from practice. Now, as a full-time attorney immersed in New York City’s fast-paced real estate sector, I strive to bring this same practical approach to my class by treating students as if they are associates in my legal department and by sharing my day-to-day challenges and lessons from the field.”

Deborah Gonzalez ’97 is still processing her whirlwind year in politics.

In November 2017, Gonzalez won a Georgia General Assembly seat in a special election. Though she was an entertainment and intellectual property lawyer who had never run for office before, she flipped her local district from Republican to Democrat and became the second Latina elected in the history of the Georgia State House. Her historic campaign won attention from documentary filmmaker Michael Moore and actress and activist Alyssa Milano. A year later, in the general election, Gonzalez was narrowly defeated by her Republican challenger. Despite the outcome, Gonzalez is feeling inspired, optimistic, and even more eager to get involved. She spoke with New York Law School Magazine about her experience as a first-time politician—and her hopes for the future.

Why did you go into public service?
In 2016, when I went into the voting booth, there were no options for the Georgia General Assembly other than the incumbent, who I felt didn’t represent my values. In fact, across Georgia in 2016, 84 percent of seats were unopposed. Democracy is about choices, and there were no choices. I come from a military family, and my father always taught us that you have a duty to stand up if no one else is. So, I said, I’ll do it—I’ll run.

In the 2017 special election, you were out-funded four to one, but you won. How?
First of all, I wasn’t a politician. I am a regular person who saw things that needed to be fixed and wanted to do the work. That resonated with people. Also, we had an incredible group of volunteers who would knock on doors every weekend. Some people in our district said that no one had done that in 15 or more years. Finally, as a Latina, a single mother, and now a grandmother, I truly relate to the struggles of many people in my district.

What did it feel like to receive national attention during your campaign?
It was surreal. One day Michael Moore was talking about me on CNN. I thought, “What is he talking about? I’m nobody.” But I think he saw me as proof that you don’t necessarily need millions of dollars to win an election.

What are you most proud of having accomplished as a legislator?
I’m proud of my efforts to give working families a pathway to prosperity. I co-sponsored legislation to expand Medicaid, fought for living wages and against discrimination in wages based on race and gender, and advanced a state law that would create a cause of action for sexual harassment. Georgia funds public education through a system that is over 40 years old, and I pushed to update the formula because many schools are still woefully underfunded. But I’m most proud of my constituent services work—helping people in my community resolve their issues.

What was the biggest challenge in the role, and how did it strengthen you?
My biggest challenge was being a woman, a minority, and in the minority party for Georgia. I never apologize for who I am or my values. I learned, though, that if I can show I am good at my work, they may not like me, but they’ll respect my credibility. Here’s an example: There was a bill that would have allowed Georgia to give the fingerprint data of people who applied to state jobs to the FBI. As it happens, I’d written a book called Managing Online Risk, published by Elsevier. When I gave my speech against the bill, a colleague took out my book and showed it to the other legislators. The Republican representatives came to me afterwards and said, “You obviously know what you’re talking about.”

How did NYLS influence your professional pathway?
I’m very appreciative of NYLS. When I was applying to law schools, NYLS was one of the few that had weekend and evening classes. I was raising two little girls and working full-time, so having that option was great. I also received a scholarship that alleviated a lot of financial pressure. I loved taking entertainment and intellectual property electives in my 2L and 3L years and engaging in dialogue in small groups. When I decided to run, I reached out to fellow alumni in New York and D.C., and they supported me, regardless of their party affiliation.

How did you feel on election night 2018?
We felt confident going in, but at the end of the day, there are more Republicans than Democrats in my district. Republicans were highly motivated to vote in order to flip the seat back and because our newly elected governor is from my district. Still, I’m proud of our incredible grassroots campaign. My win in 2017 inspired other Democrats to run in 2018. And we increased voter turnout in our precincts by double digits in 2018. This isn’t about just one night or one election. This is about doing the work every day.

What are your plans for 2019?
Right now, I’m taking time to reflect on this experience and evaluate a few opportunities that have come across my desk. Whether I pursue in politics again or not, I want to continue serving my country. This experience taught me so much about my local community. Many people have approached me to say that my service inspired them and that, as a result, they are reengaging with politics again after years of being disconnected. I couldn’t be prouder of that.
Get to know the two dynamic graduates leading new efforts to engage the School’s worldwide alumni base.

Marcy L. Grigsby ’06 and Pam Foster ’00

Alumni engagement is, first and foremost, about supporting our students. It’s also about creating opportunities for alumni to tap into the truly impressive NYLS network that exists in virtually every part of law, business, and public service. I want to help make those connections through the events and programs we offer.

—Marcy L. Grigsby ’06

It’s clear to me that the more alumni help current students, the better it is for students, the School, and alumni.

—Pam Foster ’00
In March 2018, Marcey Grigsby ’06 joined NYLS as Vice President for Institutional Advancement and Chief Development Officer, where she oversees the School’s alumni relations and development efforts.

“As an alumna, I’d watched a lot of exciting things happening at NYLS, including how the School aligned its academic priorities with what’s driving activity in the legal profession,” Grigsby says. “Our new Think BIG curriculum and the phenomenal growth of our clinical program are just two examples. I’m excited to share that success with alumni and find ways for them to be part of it.”

Grigsby brings an insider’s view of the legal profession and a unique perspective on engaging alumni. She previously led business development teams at Ropes & Gray LLP and Debevoise & Plimpton LLP after leaving practice. She also remained connected to NYLS since graduating and, from 2010 to 2013, served as the New York Law School Law Review’s publisher and an adjunct professor.

“Alumni engagement is, first and foremost, about supporting our students,” she says. “It’s also about creating opportunities for alumni to tap into the truly impressive NYLS network that exists in virtually every part of law, business, and public service. I want to help make those connections through the events and programs we offer.”

Grigsby enjoys guiding alumni in identifying ways to stay connected—whether as mentors, speakers at on-campus events, by attending alumni-only events, or through gifts inspired by their own experience that will benefit current students.

“I have yet to talk to an alum where we couldn’t find a place for them to give back in a personally meaningful way,” she says.

She sees the spirit of NYLS’s student body as an enduring source of pride for all alumni.

“Our students today have the same grit and determination that has long been a hallmark of NYLS graduates,” she says. “They don’t take anything for granted. Alumni I talk to recognize those qualities in themselves and want to help students succeed. The impact of alumni involvement cannot be overstated.”

In November 2018, Grigsby expanded her team by adding another talented alumna, Elizabeth Briand ’11, as Director of Development.

For Pam Foster ’00, being an evening student at NYLS was an unforgettable experience.

“There’s nothing like being in a Criminal Law class and talking about the Fourth Amendment with people who are cops by day and use it in practice,” she says.

In April 2018, Foster was elected President of NYLS’s Alumni Association after having served a term as Vice President. She also joined the NYLS Board of Trustees, where she advises the School on strategic decision-making, and she remains Board Chair of the Safe Passage Project, founded by Professor Lenni Benson.

After graduating from NYLS, Foster practiced ERISA (Employee Retirement Income Security Act) and employment law at Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP. After a few years at the firm, she missed the nonprofit sector, where she’d begun her career.

When The Rockefeller Foundation, where she’d worked before and during law school, recruited her back, she jumped at the chance. After returning, Foster spent more than 14 years at the Foundation in roles that blended law and operations.

Today, she is Chief Operating Officer of Co-Impact, a new global philanthropic collaborative that funds efforts in developing countries to improve outcomes in health, education, and economic opportunity.

Foster’s top goal as Alumni Association President is to increase alumni engagement with the School.

“If coming to an Alumni Association meeting isn’t for you, there are plenty of other ways to get involved,” she says. “Hiring? Make sure to include NYLS students and alumni in your applicant pool. Consider offering a student externship, mentoring a student or recent graduate, or participating in the annual Bar Exam Lunch Program, an easy way to give back.”

In working with the Alumni Association Board, Foster draws inspiration from the prior President, Hon. Marc J. Whiten ’84, who encouraged members to pursue their passions in areas that align with NYLS’s priorities. His efforts resulted in a number of active networking groups and successful CLE programs.

“It’s clear to me that the more alumni help current students, the better it is for students, the School, and alumni,” Foster says.
RECONNECTING TO NYLS

Interested in getting involved with the School again but unsure about next steps? Foster and Grigsby share tips:

DROP A LINE.

Contact the Institutional Advancement team with news of your practice area and recent accomplishments. “The first step can be a small step,” says Grigsby. “We’re always happy to share alumni achievements, and that often leads to opportunities for involvement.”

ATTEND A CLE OR OTHER EVENT.

Find upcoming events in NYLS’s Alumni Connections e-newsletter, by following the School’s social media accounts, or at www.nyls.edu. While on campus, introduce yourself to current students. “They really value opportunities to connect with alumni,” Grigsby says. “So do I! If you’re on campus and have a few minutes to grab coffee, let me know.”

PLAY A LEADERSHIP ROLE.

“Come to an Alumni Association meeting, and be part of shaping programs for students and alumni,” Foster says. “I love hearing from alumni about the best ways we can engage them.”

MAKE A GIFT THAT MAKES A DIFFERENCE.

Alumni gifts are essential to supporting student programs and provide a vote of confidence to current students. Unrestricted gifts to the Annual Fund go to NYLS’s areas of greatest need. “Gifts in any amount have an impact,” Grigsby says. “The most important thing is that alumni invest and feel invested in the School.” Employer matching programs can extend your gift’s reach, and estate giving helps ensure your NYLS legacy.

MENTOR A STUDENT.

Some alumni may prefer a one-on-one mentoring relationship instead of large group events. “Supporting individual students allows you to get involved in a way that fits your schedule,” Foster says.

OUTSIDE OF NEW YORK CITY? NO PROBLEM.

Grigsby described a Chicago-based alum who mentored a recent graduate in New York City by phone and email. When the recent graduate reached a professional juncture and needed advice, she leaned on her mentor. “In that moment, she was able to get a very helpful perspective,” Grigsby says.

SHARE YOUR MEMORABILIA.

The Mendik Library is not only a vast research facility for students and alumni; it’s also “where NYLS history lives on,” says Grigsby. Case in point: The family of a Class of 1916 graduate recently donated his class photo to be preserved in the School’s archives and on Digital Commons. The family of another Class of 1916 graduate has since enjoyed viewing the remarkable photo.
As Dean Anthony W. Crowell often says, NYLS is more than a school—it’s a “family”—a community that welcomes and supports alumni throughout their professional lives. In that spirit of personal investment, several alumni shared their reasons for supporting the School.

JOAM ALISME ’14 • Legal Fellow, Everytown for Gun Safety; Member, NYLS Alumni Association Board

“As a student, I was very involved with the Black Law Students Association, the Moot Court Association, and the Student Bar Association. I remember how it felt when alumni supported our work and made it possible for us to attend important events. Alumni support was also critical to NYLS’s Bar Exam Lunch Program, which began around the time I sat for the exam. I always wanted to emulate those examples of giving, and now, I’m proud to donate every year. When alumni invest in the School, it benefits all of us.”

SANG-KI LEE ’68 • Retired Patent Attorney

“I spent most of my career working as a patent lawyer, in locations around the world, but in recent years, it has made me very happy to reestablish a closer relationship with NYLS, my alma mater, and to attend events at the School. I recently made a gift in honor of the Class of 1968’s 50th anniversary. I hope that my gift inspires other 50th-anniversary gifts in the years to come. I myself would not have been able to attend law school without financial assistance and was fortunate to receive support from my employer. After I retired from practicing law, I helped establish Handong International Law School in South Korea. It teaches a U.S. legal curriculum and is going strong. I am proud to support legal education and NYLS students.”

ALAN LEIBOWITZ ’74 • Managing Partner, Hess & Leibowitz, PLLC

“I’m impressed by how NYLS has substantially expanded its clinical programs, and I wanted to make a gift that supports this great work. I still practice in downtown Manhattan today, along with fellow Class of 1974 graduate Steven L. Hess, whom I met during our first week of classes.”

JANET HALECKY ’93 • Managing Director, Wells Fargo & Company

“NYLS provided me with not only a strong core curriculum, but also the unmatched professional opportunities that come with attending law school in downtown Manhattan. The further I advance in my career, the more I look back and appreciate how well the School combined the academic and the practical. By supporting NYLS’s Annual Fund now, I can help ensure that today’s students also benefit from those advantages.”

DENNIS MALEN ’68 • Partner at Malen & Associates, P.C.; 50th Anniversary Co-Chair, 2018 Alumni Reunion

“NYLS was a defining milestone in all of our lives. Armed with our legal education, we’ve been able to succeed in law, business, and many other fields. I know how important law school is to the current generation. Because of that, I was proud to make a gift honoring the Class of 1968. I want to help ensure that today’s NYLS students have the same opportunities I received.”

SUMMANA S. ABDUL-HASIB ’13 • Senior Legal Operations Analyst, Fidelity Investments

“I remember the bar exam vividly—the adrenaline on the first day and the exhaustion on the second day. Luckily, because of NYLS’s Bar Exam Lunch Program, I also felt relief that I didn’t have to worry about lunch. This year, I supported the Program. If I can help a fellow NYLS grad feel just a little less stressed while taking the exam, I’m all for it. I’ve also served as a judge in NYLS student competitions on weekends. Giving back and staying connected to NYLS is important to me.”

WHY I GIVE BACK TO NYLS

Alumni Reflect on the Rewards of Supporting the School

NYLS’s annual Bar Exam Lunch Program treats bar-takers to essential bar prep resources and a free lunch—with a side of encouragement—during the grueling exam days. The 2018 program, themed “#BarExamChampions,” marked an all-time high for alumni participation. The NYLS Alumni Association, spearheaded by President Pam Foster ’00 and Vice President Manny Alicandro ’12, organized alumni support. NYLS Board Chair Arthur N. Abbey ’59 matched donations from the general alumni community, and NYLS trustees made leadership gifts. On the days of the exam, Dean Anthony W. Crowell, faculty members, staff, and alumni passed out the lunches with a smile.

Family of Jay Watnick ’59 Honors His Legacy With a Transformative $1 Million Gift

Jay Watnick ’59, who passed away in April 2018, was so fond of intellectual discussion that friends affectionately dubbed him “the human encyclopedia.” His fierce intelligence propelled him to a highly successful career in life insurance and benefited the students he taught at Marymount College, as well as countless others he generously mentored. In honor of his remarkable legacy, his wife, Marianna Watnick, and the Watnick family made a transformative $1 million gift to NYLS.

In recognition of his lifelong love of reading, learning, and teaching, and his deep commitment to NYLS, the School will establish the Jay S. Watnick ’59 Reading Room and Legal Research Center within its Mendik Library.

The Watnick family’s gift enables life-changing scholarships by establishing the Marianna and Jay S. Watnick ’59 Scholarship Fund. The Fund will benefit high-achieving NYLS students, with preference for those who have demonstrated interest in legal research or financial services, two areas of focus in Jay Watnick’s life. A few years after he graduated from NYLS, the New York City native launched his life insurance career. He would go on to work for some of the nation’s top insurance companies—New York Life, Mutual Benefit Life, and Security Mutual Life Insurance Company—before creating his own pension administration company and leading Namco Financial Group. At Marymount, he taught financial and estate planning courses.

The gift’s timing is particularly poignant: This spring would have marked the 60th anniversary of his graduation from NYLS. The Class of 1959 numbered fewer than 100 students upon graduation, but its members have demonstrated extraordinary success and generosity. NYLS Board Chair Arthur N. Abbey ’59, one of the School’s most distinguished and dedicated graduates, is a member. The class maintains a scholarship fund that has awarded around $50,000 in the last five years to deserving NYLS students.

“I am so happy that the Watnick family has agreed to make a very generous gift to NYLS to honor Jay’s memory,” Arthur Abbey ’59 said. “Jay was my classmate, and we graduated together. He had a great mind. When called upon in class, he was always prepared, and he was a good match for some difficult professors. We stayed friendly over the years, and he told me often how much he appreciated his legal education and how helpful it was to his business success. Now he will be forever remembered, with his name prominently displayed in the Library reading room.”
